PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 9, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee, who art the author and source of truth. We have found from Divine revelation that truth takes no rise from outward things, but lies in fullness within us. Yet only Thy grace can refine and purify the spirit to know the sources of truth, to measure its force, and to give it application to the affairs and circumstance of life. We come before Thee that Thou wilt touch us, refining our spirit, that we may know the course that Thou wouldst lead us, the way that Thou wouldst guide, that in all the affairs of our lives we may be governed by Thine unerring counsel, and that the outcome of our deliberations and of our action may redound to the glory of Thy name and the betterment of mankind. For Christ's sake. Amen.

ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, and HENRY L. MYERS, a Senator from the State of Montana, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate communications from the Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, authentic copies of the certificates of the final ascertainment of electors for President and Vice President of the United States chosen at the election on the 7th day of November, 1916, in the States of Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida and corrections, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin and correction. The communications and accompanying papers will be placed on the files of the Senate.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting in response to a resolution of May 23, 1914, certain information concerning commodities the importation of which would be affected by the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate commerce of convict-made goods. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

SECOND PAN AMERICAN FINANCIAL CONFERENCE (S. DOC. NO. 671).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation of $50,000, for inclusion in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, authorizing the President to extend to the Governments of Central and South America an invitation to be represented by their ministers of finance and leading bankers in the Second Pan American Financial Conference in the city of Washington, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SIOUX INDIAN SCHOOLS (S. DOC. NO. 670).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the investigation directed by the Secretary of the Interior as to the probable cost of providing on the various Sioux Indian Reservations adequate school facilities for the children of the Sioux Tribes who are now without Government or public-school facilities, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by E. E. Taylor, jr., one of its clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 186) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLOOD, Mr. CLINE, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Northeastern Saengerbund of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against prohibition in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition signed by a large number of employees of the customs district of Massachusetts praying for an increase in their salaries and also for the enactment of legislation providing an equitable system of retirement. The petition is very brief and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without the signatures and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned employees of the customs district of Massachusetts, do respectfully petition your honorable body to enact into law an equitable system of retirement, and to grant an increase of salary in accordance with the following graduated scale:

Employees receiving salaries of less than $1,000 per annum, an increase of 33⅓ per cent.

Employees receiving salaries of $1,000 or more, but less than $1,500 per annum, an increase of 25 per cent.

Employees receiving salaries of $1,500 or more, but less than $2,000 per annum, an increase of 20 per cent.

Employees receiving salaries of $2,000 or more, but less than $2,500 per annum, an increase of 15 per cent.

Employees receiving salaries of $2,500 or more, an increase of 10 per cent.

We are moved to make this petition because of the constantly increasing cost of the necessities of life, and the fact that there has been no general advance in the pay of the Government employees for many years.

Employees in commercial life have bountifully received of the extraordinary prosperity with which our country has been blessed during the present administration. Increases in wages of from 5 per cent to 30 per cent and equitable pension systems for aged employees are a matter of daily record in the newspapers.

To the great body of Government employees the purchasing power of whose salaries has been gradually diminishing, it has been a period of hardship rather than of good times.

Worry incidental to the inadequacy of salaries to meet living expenses and to provide for sickness and old age impairs efficiency; therefore your petitioners firmly believe that it is not only an act of justice but sound economic policy to pay adequate salaries and make reasonable provisions for the pensioning of aged employees.

Recognizing it not only as an act of justice, but considering it to be for their own best interest, practically all the nations of the civilized world are pensioning their aged employees. Is it too much, therefore, to expect that the United States, the richest and most advanced among the nations, should adopt some adequate system of retirement for superannuated employees?

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of Captain Charles D. Gridley Garrison, No. 4, Army and Navy Union, of Erie, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the survivors of McLean's Pennsylvania regiment and their widows and children, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of Local Union No. 40, International Union of United Brewery Workmen, of Bridgeport, Conn., and a memorial of Cigarmakers' Local Union, of Ansonia, Conn., remonstrating against national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maryland, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transmission of liquor advertisements through the mails, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a petition of the Tucson Luncheon and Advertising Club, of Arizona, praying for the enactment of a universal compulsory military training law. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the public declarations of the Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States of America have indicated the failure of our present system of voluntary military training and the necessity for a system of universal military education; and

Whereas his utterances have the indorsement of his associates on the General Staff of the Army; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the members of this club that the recommendations of these experts should be given full effect by the Congress of the United States, and that in a democracy such as ours equal rights should impose equal obligations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this organization indorse the plan of universal compulsory military education and training and respectfully request its Congressmen to do all in their power to secure the passage of such measure or measures as will put this system in force, and that this organization further request its Congressmen to inform it of their attitude toward this question.

TUCSON LUNCHEON AND ADVERTISING CLUB,
By L. H. HOFMEISTER, President.
H. R. HEIGHTON, Secretary.

Adopted December 29, 1916.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the national bankruptcy act, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Sacramento, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide 1-cent letter postage on first-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

NAVAL OIL SUPPLY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on Sunday morning an article appeared in the Washington Post referring to a letter written by the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Senate Naval Committee urging that committee to defeat the so-called compromise legislation designed to give claimants a small percentage of the naval petroleum reserve in California and Wyoming.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I trust there may be order, so that the Senator from Colorado may be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is an important matter, and we would like to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The occupants of the galleries must preserve order. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. From the standpoint of the Secretary the letter was justified and of course will receive full consideration at the hands of the distinguished chairman of that committee. I had no intention at the time the article appeared of discussing the subject matter of this letter except in connection with the leasing bill when that measure was taken up for consideration. But the World of this morning contains a summary of an address delivered last evening by Mr. Gifford Pinchot before the New York Republican Club in which he is reported to have said that—

Congress is also proposing through the oil-land provisions of the Phelan amendment to turn into private hands the petroleum reserves set aside by presidential proclamation for the use of the Navy. Modern warships burn oil. As to this bill the Secretary of the Navy said that it would take away from the Government that which in time of peril might change the tide of war.

He then asked if national folly could go further.

In view of the fact that this speech is a general attack upon and an assertion of the vicious nature of certain proposed legislation now upon the Senate calendar I have determined to refer briefly to the subject at this time.

Mr. President, a prevalent notion among a great portion of the people and particularly those in the Eastern States, is that every citizen in the West who seeks to avail himself of the laws of the United States by acquiring an interest in the public domain is a law breaker, an adventurer, or a thief. Prima facie he is regarded with severe suspicion, and his actions are regarded as those of a malefactor until he is able, which is an extremely difficult thing to do in these days, to convince the powers that be to the contrary.

Now, Mr. President, the Navy of the United States and its needs is and should be a subject of prime concern to the legislator, but the rights of the private citizen and the need of extending justice and protection to him in the due exercise of them is a far greater one and one of far more pressing moment at this time.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the effort now making to convert this Government into a great landlord with our citizenship as its tenantry.

I am not in favor of the leasing bill which will soon be called up for discussion. I regard it with extreme disfavor. Ordinarily I would vote against it, but inasmuch as the very financial existence of a great many citizens who have in good faith, and in accordance with the law as they have been advised, gone upon the public domain and sought to develop its resources is in the balance, I feel constrained to cast my vote for the bill when it is finally considered. So much do I feel that the great bulk of these people have been harshly and unjustly dealt with that they need the helping hand of this Government for their protection, to the extent to which it may be grudgingly given, that they can not be reproached with lack of good faith or any desire to violate the law in the letter or in the spirit, that I do not hesitate to assert that one of the supreme requirements of the hour is to extend relief to them before the present Congress expires. So believing, I feel impelled to say that if the naval program is to become effective through legislation by this session—and I speak in my own behalf, although I believe I reflect the opinion of some of my associates—it will encounter very serious and perhaps insuperable difficulties if the right of these people to relief is not respected. This right shall not, if I can help it, be sacrificed to what I consider a subject of less importance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some of us who reside in the far East and who have not very accurate knowledge concerning these matters that our western friends are greatly interested in feel a great deal of doubt as to the great questions that are to come before the Senate. I will venture to ask my learned friend from Colorado if all efforts have been exerted to bring about a compromise understanding between the Navy Department and the citizen as to the questions that will be involved in this bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; Mr. President, I think that all possible efforts have been resorted to and have been exhausted.

Mr. GALLINGER. And have failed?

Mr. THOMAS. And have failed with that department. It remains obdurate, and so we shall have to be.

Now, let me say, Mr. President, that this entire subject is within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. The Department of the Interior is satisfied, not entirely so but as a compromise is satisfied, with the amendments which the Committee on Public Lands considered and which were recently reported by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN]. In fact, they are much more satisfactory to that department than they are to some members of the committee, myself included.

Indeed, Mr. President, a remarkable anomaly in public administration is presented by this unnatural situation. The Navy Department intruded itself into the land administration, and the resulting confusion was inevitable.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. I have the right to complain of it. Doubtless the purpose of it is legitimate, and I know that the intentions of the Secretary of the Navy are of the best. He seeks to discharge his duties and his obligations as he sees them and as he is advised by the Attorney General. But that does not help the situation. Let me state an instance which indicates what injustice flows from the action of the Navy Department with regard to this proposition. I may say in passing that there is plenty of oil in the country for the Navy and for those who are entitled to the oil they have discovered, to which they have a lawful right of possession, which they have sought to obtain by proper and legitimate location. The Honolulu Oil Co. has expended millions of dollars in the perfectly legitimate exploitation of some of this land. It made application for a patent. Its papers have been subjected to the most rigid scrutiny. The Interior Department went over them microscopically, and after a long, exhaustive, and complete investigation of its claims passed the papers for patent; whereupon, at the request of the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy, the patents were held up, and since that time these two great departments of the Government have interfered successfully to prevent this company from securing its lawful property. Consequently, although these people are entitled to their patents, having complied with every possible requirement of the law, having satisfied the one department of the country which has and ought to have sole jurisdiction of the subject, are even more helpless and more distantly removed from their title than when they made application. And there are other instances. These things appeal to us, Mr. President, and we believe that justice, fairness, and common decency require us to assert and apply the existing law for the benefit of those who have acted under it and are paramount to every other consideration just now. Beside it even the Navy bill is of secondary importance.

Mr. Pinchot goes on——

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator proceeds with that I should like to ask him a question. Is it because of the relief provision that is in the bill the Senator is going to vote for the bill on its final passage?

Mr. THOMAS. Entirely. Were it not for that I would vote against it.

Mr. SMOOT. I was very much surprised to hear the Senator say that he is going to vote for the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall vote for the bill only as a dernier ressort. I want to vote for these amendments independently of the bill, and hope I may be able to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, then, does not wish the Senate to understand that he is in favor of the leasing system?

Mr. THOMAS. By no means.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason he will vote for the bill is because of the relief provision in it?

Mr. THOMAS. The sole reason, because in the discharge of my duty as a Senator I believe I should do justice to these suffering people, and this bill is the only possible measure of relief.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say, as far as I am concerned, that I have great sympathy for the few people asking relief, but I think there would be more harm done to the citizens of the United States by ingrafting in our laws a provision that would make the Government of the United States a landlord and a leaser of the public domain, instead of the people owning the lands themselves and the people developing them, than if we failed at the present time to grant the relief provided for it in the bill, because I believe that relief should come by special legislation rather than to have it pass upon that bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I share very largely in the view of the Senator, as he knows. But in discussing this and other bills designed for the relief of the western people Mr. Pinchot last night said:

For the second time within five years the Old Guard has cost the Republican Party a national election.

Mr. President, that may be true. I am not within the inner councils of the Republican Party; consequently I am not able either to affirm or disaffirm that statement; but I think I know something of the effect upon the western electorate of Mr. Pinchot's support of the Republican ticket, where he surely, albeit unintentionally, was the Old Guard's accessory before the fact. Mr. Pinchot is a most excellent gentleman; he is a man of high character, of earnestness and sincerity, but with conservation he is obsessed. Although repudiated by his society, he seems to regard it as the summum bonum of all things; but it is not so regarded in the West. When Mr. Pinchot announced his support of the Republican nominee, and when the Republican committee permitted him to circulate his letter giving his reasons therefor, with his picture at the top or in the center of it, the heart of western Democracy beat high with joy. The conviction in my section of the country at once arose that, in the event of the success of Mr. Hughes, who was supported by Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Pinchot or Mr. Garfield would probably be called to administer the affairs of the Interior or Agricultural Department or both. As Democrats we utilized that situation to the best of our ability; and I want here to say that it gave us thousands of votes in the State of Colorado, and, I think, in other public-land States which otherwise might have gone elsewhere.

There were other elements supporting the Republican ticket which were equally beneficial to us. The Senate knows what I mean. I shall not refer to them specifically now. I may do so on some other occasion; but if it be true that the Old Guard for the second time within five years cost the Republican Party a national election, it is equally true that Mr. Pinchot and his prominence as a supporter of the ticket of the Old Guard contributed most powerfully and beneficially to that most fortunate result.

I mention this, Mr. President, merely to emphasize what I am contending for, that the public sentiment in the Rocky Mountain region upon this vital subject is stronger than partisanship, a fact which my party must recognize and heed if it is wise. That section believes itself to be the stepchild of the Nation, and that the largess of the Government, extended to all the land in times gone by, contributing to population, citizenship, and progress, has been denied us; that it has been transformed into an agency of repression; and those who support it, even seemingly, can not appeal with much confidence to western public opinion for its support. I know that the generous provisions of the laws under which citizens were permitted to locate and acquire public lands have in the past been abused, and largely by administrative connivance. I know that the rights of the people must be safeguarded against the repetition of these abuses. But a great government can not afford to punish and proscribe honest men because of the crimes of others for which they can not be responsible, which they could not prevent, and which they have always denounced.

Mr. President, perhaps I have occupied too much time in discussing this matter; but in view of the Secretary's letter I felt it to be my duty to impress upon the Senate the earnestness with which some of us propose to assert the rights of these people to their lands, notwithstanding the opposition which we may encounter and which may make the discharge of our duty both unwelcome and unpleasant, for if the Nation demands big navies and armies her people demand justice as well to the humblest citizen.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate a petition that is signed by 47,000 residents of the city of Washington, asking for a referendum on the prohibition question. The petition is at the Secretary's desk and, although I do not ask that the 47,000 names be read, I ask that the language of the petition may be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the petition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the petition is read I will ask my friend from Alabama whether the signers are adults or whether the names were gathered up without any reference to age?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not state that, because I am not informed. The petition is on the roll below the Secretary's desk. I ask the Secretary to place the petition on the desk in order that the Senator from New Hampshire may see it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am afraid, Mr. President, that time is too precious to examine the petition carefully.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not say as to the sex or age of those petitioners, but it is a bona fide petition in favor of the referendum in the District of Columbia, and I am told by those who got it up, reputable men, that it contains the names of 47,000 persons. I ask that the language of the petition be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that the entire list of names on the page of the petition that is now before me seems to be in the handwriting of the same person. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to say that the rules of the Senate prohibit demonstrations in the galleries; and if such a demonstration occurs again the Chair will not hesitate to order the galleries cleared.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now ask that the language of the petition be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

REFERENDUM PETITION.

We, the undersigned residents of the District of Columbia, protest to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled against the enactment of a District prohibition bill, and we petition Congress before passing a prohibition law to provide for a referendum in this District on the question.

Do not sign unless you are a resident of the District and 21 years of age.

Do not sign more than one petition.

Sign this petition if you wish the people of the District to settle the prohibition question themselves.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a word, some of the Senators who have examined the petition think that I was mistaken in saying that the writing was that of a single individual. I am still persuaded that the writing is of such a nature as to indicate that most of the names were written by the same individual, but in that I may be mistaken. I submit it for the consideration of Senators, who may examine the petition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, a number of Senators, since the Senator from New Hampshire made the statement, have examined the petition, and they state to me that the names are not signed in the same handwriting; but it is possible that here and there a petition may sometimes be signed in the same handwriting. But, Mr. President, I wish to assure the Senate that, no matter what reflections may be made on the petition, it is a bona fide petition, containing the names of residents of this District who have honestly signed it, expressing the wish of the people of this District against sumptuary legislation being enacted without their consent or without their having an opportunity for a voice in the matter.

I wish in this connection, Mr. President, to have read a resolution which has been passed by a mass meeting of citizens of the District of Columbia on this question, and in connection with it to have printed in the RECORD four editorials of the four leading newspapers of Washington favoring a referendum on this subject. I will not ask to have the editorials read, but I will ask that they be printed in the RECORD. I ask, however, that the resolution may be read.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me to ask him what meeting it is to which he refers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was a mass meeting called for the purpose of passing on the question as to whether the people of Washington were in favor of a referendum. It was held at Poli's Theater. There was a crowded house; and I say that from my own knowledge, because I was there.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will inquire whether the resolution was passed after or preceding the eloquent and persuasive speech of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The resolution was passed after I had made a speech; but I think that the audience was in favor of a referendum before I made the speech. I do not think my speech affected the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to request that certain editorials be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to suggest to the Senator that some time ago we agreed that no more newspaper editorials should be printed in the RECORD. I have not time now to go into the details of the matter——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will ask then that the Secretary read the editorials in my time.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I have no objection to that; but I was going to say to the Senator that if they were printed in the RECORD without reading they would do no good as affecting the vote of the Senate to-day. I will not object, of course, if the Senator desires the Secretary to read them, and then, of course, they will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask, Mr. President, that the Secretary may read the resolution and the editorials in my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON NEWSPAPERS AND THE WASHINGTON PUBLIC UNANIMOUSLY FOR A REFERENDUM.

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas legislation has been brought forward and will continue affecting the welfare of the citizens of the District of Columbia; and

Whereas legislation is now pending in the Congress of the United States affecting the question of prohibition for the District of Columbia and a referendum thereunder: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of the District of Columbia, assembled in mass meeting at Poli's Theater, Washington, D. C., this 7th day of January, 1917, do hereby appeal to the Congress of the United States to adopt the referendum amendment proposed by Senator OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Aalabama, in order that the citizenship of this community be given an opportunity to express its desires through a referendum vote legally and formally arranged for by the Congress of the United States. It is further submitted that to deny this right to the citizenship of the District of Columbia is un-American in principle and subversive of the tenets laid down in the foundation of this Republic. We submit to Congress that our Americanism should not be subverted, and that it is unworthy to us as American citizens to deny us the right to speak in this and other matters of paramount interest to the community.

The above was adopted as set forth.

WM. F. GUDE, Chairman.
CHAS. J. COLUMBUS,
Secretary District of Columbia Referendum Association.

[Editorial in the Star.]

THE DISTRICT REFERENDUM ISSUE.

The fight over the District referendum issue should be so conducted that whatever the result Washington will not suffer injury.

If the referendum is denied in order that the saloons may be eliminated more speedily from the District, this denial should carry with it no imputation of lack of power in Congress to grant such a referendum, and no slur upon the fitness of this community to express at the polls concerning any vital local issue an honest and sound opinion that is worthy to be heeded as advice by Congress. If for special reasons Congress shall decide that a referendum on this particular issue is inopportune at this particular time, its denial of the referendum should be based unmistakably upon this decision alone. The power of Congress in the premises should be avowed, the right of the District in equity to be thus consulted as to its legislative affairs should be recognized and conceded, and the local community should not be slandered as corruptible, degraded, and unfit to exercise this right. In short, if this referendum is not granted, it should not be denied permanently on its merits, but merely for special reasons be postponed.

If, on the other hand, Congress should decide that not only in the abstract is the District equitably entitled to be consulted concerning important local legislation through an advisory referendum, but also that it is worthy to exercise and should exercise this right at once and on the antisaloon issue that decision should be so formulated that it will mean a victory for the referendum principle in Washington—merely postponing the elimination of the saloons—and not a victory solely for the saloons, in substance defeating the effort to abolish them. To this end, if a referendum is granted, Congress should through this medium secure the honest opinion and advice of all bona fide residents of the District, including women as well as men, and including all Government employees, irrespective of their retention of legal residence in the States. All the safeguards that Congress can supply to assure that the vote shall be intelligently and honestly cast will be welcomed. The abolition of the saloon should not be proposed in terms calculated to create unnecessary antagonisms and to invite its defeat. The issue should be stated in the clearest, simplest form, so as to assure a maximum of consideration as a moral issue in the homes and in the churches, and so as to involve a minimum of destruction of Washington's industries, confining that destruction strictly to the factories making alcoholic beverages, whose existence is inconsistent with prohibition.

A referendum vote on the antisaloon issue would stir profoundly every home, however humble, in the District. It would arouse the interest of business Washington. It would develop the full and, the Star is convinced, the honest vote of one of the most intelligent communities in the United States. Washingtonians would be on trial as to their fitness, not merely to be consulted as to local affairs by Congress through the referendum, but to be represented in that Congress and in the Electoral College like other Americans.

If a referendum is granted and Washington meets this test, the way will be cleared for the 360,000 Americans of the District, a population exceeding that of six of the States, to be in important respects Americanized, and to be transferred by constitutional amendment from the status of political aliens to that of citizens of a State for the purpose at least of representation in Congress and the Electoral College.

If, on the other hand, the District is denied the referendum on the insulting ground that its voting constituency is venal and unworthy, or if the referendum is granted and Washington fails to meet the test, the Americanization of Washington will be indefinitely postponed, to the Capital community's lasting injury and shame.

[Editorial in the Post.]

LEAVE IT TO THE PEOPLE.

The Senate is expected to vote to-morrow on the question whether the issue of prohibition in the District of Columbia shall be submitted to the people.

This is such a purely local question and touches the habits of the people so closely that it can very properly be submitted to them. Congress can ascertain from the people themselves what is best to be done.

Unless the question is submitted it will be impossible to determine whether a majority of the people favor or are opposed to prohibition.

No one questions the power of Congress to enact a prohibition law without consulting the people. But it is equally clear that Congress has the power to refer the question to the people if it chooses to do so.

Congress has power to dispose of and make rules respecting the territory of the United States. It has submitted the question of statehood to populations much smaller than the population of the District of Columbia. Few, if any, States have been admitted with a larger population than is now contained in this District. Yet the people in each case were permitted to pass upon the question and to draw up their constitutions.

Some Members of Congress may be reluctant to refer any question to popular vote in this District for fear that a precedent may be established and the way paved for suffrage. But this is wholly in the hands of Congress, and the prohibition referendum will not serve as a precedent calling for future referendums unless Congress so determines. If the vote on prohibition should be disappointing to Congress for any reason whatever it could be held up as a warning against granting suffrage. The argument as to establishing a precedent cuts both ways.

The instinctive impulse of Americans is to submit such questions as this to the people and to abide by the decision of the majority. There is no other way of satisfying the people. All of them are perfectly willing to accept the verdict rendered by most of them. They are habituated to this method of settling public affairs.

The Senate and House will not go wrong if they refer to the people the question of prohibition in this District. No one knows what the decision would be, and it does not matter—it would be a righteous decision, binding upon the people who made it. A decision by Congress might be right or wrong, but a decision by the people could not be wrong.

[Editorial in the Times.]

WASHINGTON'S VOICE IN WASHINGTON'S AFFAIRS.

People who are in favor of a dry Washington, and who believe that end is so important that it should not be jeopardized even in order to give the local community a chance to express its sentiments of the subject, will, in the opinion of the Times, do an injustice to the community and to the cause of popular government here. If it is fair that Congress, representing home sentiments which have no relations to Washington problems, actuated largely by political considerations foreign to the Capital, may fairly impose a rule upon this community without listening to the expression of Washington opinion, then the same procedure must be equally fair in any other case. If Washington shall demonstrate that a considerable and highly respectable proportion of its people actually fear to assume a voice in their government, then there is no argument for local participation in other governmental affairs.

From the standpoint of the prohibitionists, it would be better business to have the saloon abolished with the acquiescence of the community, than to have Congress alone take the action. Their cause would be strengthened with future Congresses if there had been a referendum which indorsed the dry law; while, on the other hand, if it were defeated, there would be always the chance to fight again another day.

Washington is entitled to part in determining the great questions of local policy. A referendum on one question would be an opening wedge in the direction of wider participation in government. It would establish a precedent of the utmost value. The beginning would have been made toward representation of the District in Congress, and toward some measure of popular partnership in the great affair of building a nation's and a world's city here. That is a consummation not ever to be attained rightly under the present system. As well graft a rule of Prussian landed military aristocracy on Switzerland, as to try, here in the midst of democratic America, to create a true American Capital under the institutions of a royal duchy. The thing is not going ultimately to succeed; and yet to the extent that Washington develops a sentiment hostile to participation in its own government it breaks down the argument, now beginning to get ear and understanding, for an emancipation of this public.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is considerable morning business yet to attend to before the hour of 1 o'clock arrives, at which time the unanimous-consent agreement to take up the so-called prohibition bill goes into effect. As three of the editorials have been read, and there is but one more, I shall withdraw objection to having the other editorial printed in the RECORD without reading, so that we may take up morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the consent asked by the Senator from Utah is granted.

The remaining editorial is as follows:

[Editorial in the Herald.]

THE WASHINGTON HERALD ECHOES A PROTEST.

In the Senate of the United States to-morrow the citizens of the Capital City of the United States will either be granted the heritage of their fathers to pass upon their own rules of moral conduct or they will be denied that right by a majority of Senators who will be voting bids for political preferment in their home States.

The occasion will be the final vote on the Sheppard prohibition bill and the amendment offered to it by Senator OSCAR UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, providing for a referendum of this distinctly local question to the residents of the District of Columbia.

The point has been raised that it will be unconstitutional for the District of Columbia to hold an election. This is too silly to discuss. Not so many years ago the District of Columbia had a Territorial governor and legislature. It made practically all of the organic laws we now have on the local statute books. Congress merely ratified them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD'S referendum is the fairest ever devised for any community. It places the responsibility for drafting the rules of election with the District Commissioners. An amendment to it by the Democratic leader, Mr. KERN, of Indiana, provides heavy penalties for repeating, bribery, and conspiracy.

We know the District Commissioners; they are fellow townsmen and they are neighbors. The hint that they would permit a corrupt election is base calumny.

They would no more countenance bribery and kindred election crimes than they would sanction murder.

The Underwood amendment gives every resident of the District the right to vote if he or she has lived here a year. It does not even bar from voting the man or woman who makes a home in another State and is employed here.

Here in the seat of Government of the United States the woman is to have her voice on a moral question. Here also the much-desired literacy test is to be applied. No person who can not read and write is to be permitted to cast a ballot.

What more does Congress want? Does it not believe in the rule of the people? Does it believe that we are moral degenerates; that we are corrupt citizens; that we do not have down in our hearts the same love for our children and the same anxiety to keep their morals clean as the citizens of Texas, of Topeka, Kans., or Atlanta, Ga.?

We maintain that we have.

We maintain that we have the most highly developed body of intellectuals in any city in America. We maintain that our citizens have made a beautiful city here; we maintain that we are giving the Government of the United States a rare setting for its Capitol.

Aside from the moral question involved, the city of Washington and many of its residents have a material interest. One large manufacturing concern here spends $500,000 in wages to Washington workingmen each year. One of its by-products is alcohol. This pure grain alcohol is sent out of the District of Columbia for pharmaceutical uses.

Not a drop of it is used as a beverage. Yet this firm will be driven out of business by one amendment to the Sheppard bill which prohibits the shipment of alcohol from the District. Yet the same bill carries a provision admitting alcohol from outside the District for the same uses.

We do not ask the Senate to give us the vote. We demand as a right that basic stone on which the American Government is builded—the right to be represented if we are taxed.

Abraham Lincoln considered that the citizens had the right to vote on their morality. As a Member of Congress he introduced a bill submitting the slavery question to the citizens of the District.

If Lincoln was right then, why is not UNDERWOOD right now?

The Senate will decide to-morrow. Yesterday a great throng of citizens joined in a town meeting in Poli's Theater and demanded the right to vote on this purely local matter.

The Herald echoes their demand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, just one word before I yield the floor.

My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has challenged the petition that I presented here. I had not carefully examined the petition before I presented it, because it came to me from reputable gentlemen. Upon walking to the desk I find that I know personally at least half the men whose names appear on this page which was examined by the Senator from New Hampshire. The petition gives their residence addresses. They are men of high class, men of high standing in business and official life in Washington. Their names and addresses are given; and, so far as I can see, and every other Senator who has examined this paper, there is no similarity whatever in the signatures.

I simply want the RECORD to show that. I have examined other petitions here and find them the same way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just one word further in reference to this matter.

I have seen thousands of petitions signed by numerous parties, but I never in my life saw a petition that was signed as this is, where the writing in every case was heavy and apparently written by the same pen. For that reason it engaged my attention, and I made the observation that I did. If any Senator will pass a petition around Washington and have it signed by individuals and bring it in here, he will find that the writing will be so different, so far as the use of the pen and ink is concerned, that there can be no doubt as to the matter.

This petition may be a genuine petition, and very likely it is. Nevertheless, I submit that upon first examination of the page that I looked at it would impress anybody that the same pen and the same ink had been used, and that the same kind of chirography was noticeable in every signature on the page.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. I just wish to say that there is a good deal of similarity in the ink on the one page the Senator examined. That is probably because it has only about 20 or 25 names on it, and they were probably signed with the same fountain pen. But if the Senator will take the roll and examine it further, he will see that the ink changes; and not only that, but the next page has the petition signed in pencil.

Mr. GALLINGER. I spoke of the page I examined.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course; but that does not refer to the balance of the petition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I do not think there need be any controversy about the desire of the citizens of Washington. I think 40,000 signatures could be obtained to such a petition without any trouble. That is the one serious and hopeless phase of the question with which the Senate is called upon to deal.

I am going to send to the desk, and ask permission to have read, a telegram from the representatives of three-quarters of a million of white people in Mississippi, who are just as much interested in the proper government of Washington and under the law have just as much voice in the government of the city of Washington as the 40,000 who signed the petition presented by the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

I will ask to have read also and printed in the RECORD the resolutions adopted at a citizens' mass meeting in the city of Washington, held in the National Theater Sunday afternoon, about the same time that other citizens in Poli's Theater were adopting resolutions under the mesmeric influence of the eloquence of the junior Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the papers referred to will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

JACKSON, MISS., January 8, 1917.

HON. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have noted with much interest the progress of the bill introduced by Senator SHEPPARD which provided for prohibition for the District of Columbia, and we have felt deep concern over the character of the vote thereon. With every feeling of respect and confidence we most earnestly request your vote and influence in support of this bill. We submit that the business of selling liquor is a privilege and not a matter of right. We protest against the granting of this privilege in a Government-controlled political unit where the inevitable result is to aid in the interaction of liquor laws of near-by dry States. The crowned heads and Governments of Europe, without warning or consultation with their people, have taken determined stands against the use of intoxicating liquors on the ground that it is good for men physically, intellectually, and morally to abstain from such liquors and that temperance add to the economic forces of the Government and the efficiency of their armed forces. Our great industries, insurance companies, railroads, and athletes have all placed their ban upon such liquors. We regard it as a travesty upon the acts of a majority of our people who dwell in dry territory to have that part of our country which is solely controlled by our Government in the hands of the liquor forces. We feel that we are entitled to the votes of 50 Senators who represent 25 dry States, and we are entitled to the votes of others whose States are mainly dry. Permit us to remind you that the legislature of our State in 1908 passed a State-wide prohibitory act. Every legislature since then has strengthened these laws, and at no time has a referendum been had. We most earnestly request that you will not submit this great moral and economic question to an electorate which in part is similar to one which we have solemnly declared is not prepared to pass upon such measures in our own State. We ask you not to sacrifice on the grounds of "personal liberty" a question which no one claims improves man, but to regard the personal liberty of those who are taxed for jails, courthouses, hospitals, asylums, and orphanages, and to relieve them from the burdens placed upon them by those whom a partnership of the Government permits to lower themselves. We submit that we fail to see why this question of all others should be submitted to the electorate of the District of Columbia.

Yours, very sincerely,

Oscar Newton, R. E. Kennington, T. M. Hederman, Ross Collins, Lee M. Russell, E. A. Howell, W. A. Henry, W. Calvin Wells, W. F. Bond, J. G. Langston, J. D. Smythe, D. A. McIntosh, R. F. Ward, G. W. Todd, T. M. Evans, W. H. Watkins, H. V. Watkins, J. M. Hartfield, Walter J. Scott, J. C. Cavett, T. Brady, jr., M. S. Enochs, L. Brame, Paul B. Johnson, A. C. Anderson, B. W. Griffiths, J. R. Bingham, T. K. Boggan, C. D. Mitchell.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, before reading the resolutions adopted at the National Theater I want the letter accompanying the resolutions to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be read.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator, please, to pay attention to that letter. It shows the difference between the two meetings.

The Secretary read as follows:

ANTISALOON LEAGUE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1917.

DEAR SENATOR: Please find inclosed herewith copy of resolution adopted unanimously at a mass meeting held at the National Theater and the overflow meeting at Grand Army of the Republic Hall yesterday at 3 p. m. The theater was filled and the police prevented others from entering five minutes before time for the meeting to open; the overflow filled the Grand Army of the Republic Hall and at 3.20 p. m. the police refused further admissions there; and then an overflow outdoor meeting was organized attended by approximately 1,600 persons. Those in attendance represented the vast majority of the residents of the District of Columbia and are enthusiastically in favor of the Sheppard prohibition bill and against the Underwood amendment. These meetings were held under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League of the District of Columbia and the allied temperance forces.

Some persons in favor of the position above taken went to the partly filled Poli's Theater where a meeting was being held in favor of the Underwood amendment.

It is to be noted that the inclosed resolutions were unanimously adopted while the resolutions presented at Poli's Theater in favor of the Underwood amendment were adopted by a divided vote. This gives an idea of the popular feeling in the District of Columbia.

ANDREW WILSON, President.
A. E. SHOEMAKER, Executive Secretary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, of course, I would not want an untruth to pass unchallenged.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to wait until the resolution is read, and then I will yield to him. I have the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the Senator will not deny me the courtesy, since my name is mentioned in that letter, of making a statement, and a very short one.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was at the meeting to which that letter refers. I heard the vote and saw the vote. There was a very emphatic vote in favor of the resolution. There was one woman in the gallery who voted against it. Now, I heard that myself; and the balance of that statement is an absolute, unqualified untruth.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask to have the resolution read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions adopted at the mass meetings held Sunday afternoon, January 7, 1917, to protest against adding a referendum to the Sheppard District of Columbia prohibition bill.

As the citizens of the District of Columbia in mass meeting assembled at the National Theater and G. A. R. Hall, we hereby protest against the so-called referendum amendment to the District of Columbia prohibition bill, because it is of doubtful validity, and if prohibition were secured by this method it would probably be set aside by the courts.

It is impracticable, because there is no election machinery and no standards of qualification for voting. It would jeopardize the rights of Government employees in the District of Columbia to vote at such an election if they still claimed their voting citizenship in the State from which they came, as no citizen has the right to vote in two places.

It is unprecedented, as Congress has never referred any other question affecting the property, taxes, or moral welfare of the District to a vote of the people. We can see no good reason why the saloon is more sacred than other interests that are controlled directly by Congress without a referendum. The proposed referendum carries scarcely any of the safeguards against fraud, bribery, and corrupt practices which are found in State laws, and a vote under such a law would be unfair to the people of the District, and retard any effort in the future to secure an amendment to the Constitution under which people of the District might exercise the franchise legally.

A saloonless Capital means decreased drunkenness and crime, increased happiness and wealth. It means that we shall no longer license one set of men to make another set of men drunk, and then arrest those who buy the licensed liquor. It means that the Nation's Capital is keeping step with advancing civilization and the 62 per cent of the population of the United States who have declared the saloon a national nuisance.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, of course I can not vouch for the truthfulness of the statements made in this letter. It is signed, however, by gentlemen of unimpeachable character. Of course I would not be a party to anything that would misrepresent the Senator from Alabama. If he says that it is false, I am not prepared to say that he states that which is not true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, of course the statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What statement is untrue?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The statement that these men make about the vote in Poli's Theater.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Here is what they say:

It is to be noted that the inclosed resolutions were unanimously adopted, while the resolutions presented at the Poli's Theater in favor of the Underwood amendment were adopted by a divided vote.

Now, the Senator says one brave little woman objected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One; I do not know whether she was brave or not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think she was if she made the objection in presence of that crowd and she was alone.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was one vote; and, of course, that letter is intended by the men who wrote it to go into this RECORD simply to make a misleading statement. Of course it was not unanimous if there was one vote against it; but I am prepared—it is not necessary, so far as the Senator is concerned, I know—but as to the men who wrote that letter, I am prepared to bring dozens of witnesses to confirm what I say, that there was one distinct vote against the resolution, and every other vote in that theater was for it.

Of course, the mere statement that it was a divided vote could be sustained on its face by the one vote against it; but the Senator knows, as well as I know, that the purpose of the men who wrote that letter was to put a misleading statement in the RECORD, unless possibly they had been misinformed themselves. To be charitable, that may be true.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I, of course, realize that a majority of the men and women who went to Poli's Theater went there for the purpose of creating a sentiment in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, just as the men and women who went to the National Theater went there for the purpose of creating a sentiment on the other side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 1082. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

The SECRETARY. The unanimous-consent agreement entered into December 20, 1916, reads as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 1 o'clock p. m., on Tuesday, January 9, 1917, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of S. 1082, a bill to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and during that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., on said day, January 9, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than three minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1082) to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is that of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to ask unanimous consent to submit a report from a committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that can be done under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator objects, of course I will not make the request.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it could be done under the rule, I would be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. President, having taken no part in the debate upon the merits of this bill, for which I intend to vote, I feel that I should express myself briefly in opposition to the proposed amendment for referendum. Even if there had been any merit in the proposition to submit this question to the people of the District, already disfranchised on every other question, the accepted modifications of the proposed amendment, which authorizes from forty to forty-five thousand nonresidents to vote down the will of the people of the District, to my mind is so obnoxious to the principle of local government that I could not vote for the amendment if otherwise meritorious. It is but fair to say, however, that I am opposed to the submission of this question to a referendum or the popular vote of the District on principle.

My first reason is this: If the people of the District are entitled to vote on one question affecting their social and business life they are entitled to vote on all other questions. Viewing the matter from their standpoint, if they are entitled to exercise their right of suffrage on one proposition they are entitled to exercise it on all other governmental propositions. Viewing it from our standpoint, if we need an expression of their wishes to guide our judgment in this case we need a like expression in all other cases.

All of these people to-day stand disfranchised. No right of suffrage exists on any matter. We daily enact legislation affecting their most important interests. We levy their taxes, we fix their exemptions, we determine what improvements they shall have and what they shall not have. We do not ask that they pass judgment by popular vote as to whether these laws are satisfactory to them. On general principles, therefore, if we deny them the privilege of exercising their judgment upon these other matters, if we deny them the right to enact their own laws in reference to the buying and selling of their legitimate products of merchandise, the sale of which can injure no one, if it is not proper that they act upon these subjects, then what sane reason can be given for submitting to their judgment the question whether a business which we all recognize to be injurious and disastrous to many may or may not be allowed? What sane reason can we give for denying them the right to pass judgment upon a thing which can not be injurious to the morals or health of the people, and yet grant them the right to determine that a business may be continued which we know to be injurious to both? If they have the inherent right to determine whether intoxicating liquors shall be sold for consumption on the premises as freely as food articles, then why have they not the same inherent right to determine that there should be no license whatever, but absolute freedom in the traffic, without license or hindrance of any kind?

There is another reason why I am opposed to the submission of this question to a majority vote of the people of the District.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator passes from the first branch of his argument, I should like to propound an inquiry to him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator, I understand, claims that if a referendum were permitted upon this question it would constitute a discrimination, and the Senator argues that if we are to submit this question to a referendum we ought to submit all questions to a referendum of the people of the District.

Now, I ask him if what is proposed to be done here is not precisely what is done in a very large number of States of the Union, namely, that as a general thing the people are invited to act upon the question whether or not prohibition shall prevail in the State, and that as a general thing they are denied, if it can be called a denial, the right to vote upon other questions. In other words, the legislatures in the various States pass laws ordinarily without referring the question as to whether they are wise or unwise to the people, but upon this one particular matter is it not true that it is the general custom, or at any rate that it is a custom which prevails in many of the States of the Union, to submit to a vote of the people that one particular question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I would have answered that question in just one moment, but I will answer it now by saying that of late years the idea of a referendum has been a growing one. The Senator and I do not agree with the idea that every measure should first be sent to the people to see whether they desire to accept it. We believe that those who are sent to represent people should be persons who have judgment upon which the people can rely. They are entitled to our judgment as well as our service. After all, it is always the viewpoint from which we examine the whole liquor question that is to determine whether we should submit it to the people or exercise our own judgment. We do not submit the question to the people in any State whether theft should be forbidden. We exercise our own judgment as to what acts are of sufficient gravity to be penalized. Therefore it is a question of the view which each of us adopts toward the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

Whether this question should be submitted to a popular vote depends entirely on our view as to the character of the commodity which is made the subject of legislation. If we regard the use of intoxicating liquors as beneficial or even as harmless, then we have no moral right whatever to restrain their sale. If we regard their indiscriminate sale as injurious to the public, and therefore evil per se, then it is our duty to prohibit their sale or at least prohibit the public saloon.

In all movements of this kind we will find extremists on both sides. Many prohibitionists become so obsessed with the one idea that they can see no stopping place short of the complete prohibition of the manufacture of intoxicants. Mr. President, I am a prohibitionist, but my views are not so radical nor extreme. Most of the murders committed in this country are committed with firearms, but I would not prohibit the manufacture of explosives because of that fact. I admit that there is a just and proper economic demand for alcoholic products; that they have their legitimate uses in the world. I may even go so far as to admit that with our artificial life, humanity at times may need artificial stimulants, just as it needs opiates to ease pain or chloroform in surgery. The world needs all these opiates. Yet so pernicious, so dangerous is the indiscriminate use of these drugs that we are compelled to restrain their sale by the most rigid legislation. We do not submit the question of these restrictions to a vote of the people; we do not ask their advice as to whether they wish such a law. We simply say that we know their injurious effects upon many of our people, and to guard those we inconvenience the others, even though those others may be the vast majority.

So, Mr. President, recognizing their inherent dangers, we should govern, control, and restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors. We should abolish the saloons, the public bars. We should abolish them because of the injury and untold misery they inflict upon the people who acquire inebriate habits at these drinking and loafing places.

In our legislation we impose a penalty for the commission of very many acts where the line between the moral and the immoral effect of the act is not clearly seen, but we do not submit the question to a referendum, to the people, that they may determine whether they believe such act should be penalized. The public is not even asked its judgment in such cases. We exercise our own judgment, and that is what we should do now.

As I view the traffic in intoxicants by the licensed saloon as an evil per se, the question as to whether the evil should be continued is not a question of right to be determined by the majority, but should be penalized by legislative act. There is no more reason for submitting this question to a referendum than for the submission of any other act, evil per se, to the public for its judgment on the propriety of its continuance.

Mr. President, I can arrive at no other conclusion than that it is my duty to vote that a business which I know, and which everyone knows, to be injurious to the public, dangerous to the strong, and disastrous to the weak, shall no longer be countenanced as a legitimate business, and hence I shall vote against the amendment for a referendum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, during the summer of 1907 the State of Georgia, which I represent here in part, adopted State-wide prohibition. There has been some effort to criticize the manner in which the law is enforced in Georgia. I do not claim that it is completely enforced and that the use of intoxicating drinks has been entirely suppressed in Georgia. I do not deny that any distinguished visitor to the city of Atlanta, stopping at any one of our leading hotels, with friends in the city, could find some friend who from his home could furnish all the intoxicating drinks desired.

But, Mr. President, having approved that law as governor of the State, I watched the effect of it in the city of Atlanta, my home and the largest city in the State. I can say that in many an humble home after its passage, and even with partial enforcement, there was more food and better clothing for the women and for the children, and in many a home there was gentleness and kindness instead of coarseness and brutality from an intoxicated husband and father.

Mr. President, I have the report of the chief of police of the city of Atlanta, a city of more than 225,000 inhabitants. He gives the relative effect of the open barroom in the city of Atlanta for six years before prohibition and for six years afterwards. The statistics which he furnishes show that the number of cases made for intoxication in proportion to the population was about one-half in the city after prohibition, as compared to the number before, and that the number of arrests for crime was at least one-third less in proportion to population after the adoption of prohibition than before.

My own observation throughout the State satisfies me that prohibition has been beneficial and helpful to the people of the State. I was a local optionist before the passage of the law, but promised in my campaign for governor that if the State passed State-wide prohibition I would approve it. To-day any influence I might have in the State would be thrown against returning to local option and in favor of the maintenance of State-wide prohibition. I would pursue this course as the result of the beneficial effect, in my judgment, of the legislation.

Mr. President, coming to the economic side of the question, I am sure that the general business of the city of Atlanta has prospered as a consequence of prohibition; that the legitimate business of the city has largely received the money that was before wasted on liquors in the saloons. There has been a rapid accumulation of deposits in the banks, not, of course, entirely due to this subject, but in part. There has been an improvement in the business of the general retail stores and the department stores of the city, in part, in my judgment, due to prohibition.

We have one city in Georgia which was very much opposed to prohibition, the second largest city in the State, and for a long time the enforcement of the law was resisted there. I refer to the city of Savannah; but, Mr. President, within the past 12 months the law has been enforced there; and I hold in my hand an editorial from the Savannah Morning News dealing with the business condition of that city during the Christmas holidays, in which the editor rejoices that the merchants have done the best business in the history of the city. The editor, though never, I believe, a prohibitionist, further attributes at least a part of that improved business to the fact that money was going into legitimate lines, instead of being wasted for intoxicating spirits.

I wish to see barrooms driven from the District of Columbia; I wish to see the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes stopped in the District of Columbia. I believe a majority of the Senate is in favor of stopping it. Shall we act or shall we wait, and submit it to a vote of the District?

The Constitution gives us the authority to act; the Constitution puts the responsibility upon us to determine whether we will act.

I do not contest the proposition that we could submit the question if we wanted to do so, but I deny that the people of the District have any right to claim a submission because they want it. The District of Columbia occupies a position entirely different from that of any other portion of the United States. It was set apart to be the seat of government of this country; it was established free from the control of any State, free from any local control; to be the home of the Chief Executive, of the Secretaries of the departments, of the Supreme Court of the United States, of the Senate and of the House of Representatives when in session, and of all the officials from the various States who here are to perform public duties. If they hold office, they must be here for at least a part of the time. It was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution that the seat of government should not be subject to local control or direction. Over 40,000 employees of the Government are here, according to a recent report of a congressional committee. The population here is changing; it is not a stable population. If you allow them to vote one year to fix a policy, next year it would probably apply largely to a different population.

But, above all, this District was meant for the seat of government, for the homes of those who here reside, representing the people back at home in the States. The Constitution provided that the Senate and the House of Representatives should legislate for this District; that it was to be carved out of States; that no State could control it; that no local power could control it. It was to respond in its government to the wishes of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, they, in turn, responding to the wishes of the people at their respective home States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether the jurisdiction of a State legislature over the legislation for the State is not as complete as is the jurisdiction of Congress over the legislation for the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And is it not a fact that this particular question of prohibition has been the one selected by almost all the States to submit to the vote of the people of the State rather than to have it passed upon by the legislature of the State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but, Mr. President, I have just pointed out the entire difference between the District of Columbia and the States. The District of Columbia responds to the wishes of the people of the States; it is by necessity to be the residence of people who live in the States also; it is to be the enforced residence of 40,000 people. It was established for them, not for local citizen residents, but for officeholders and for their families. The people who have come in here to make the District their permanent residence without holding office have done so because they wish to do so. I deny their right to dictate the policy of local government to those of us who are here by reason of the law which compels us to be here.

The District of Columbia was made up apart from the States and put under the government of Congress in order that those of us who must necessarily be here, if we hold office, should be free from the dictation of local residents.

Suppose the local residents believed in the open gambling house; suppose the local residents desired to lead out in that line of conduct, would we permit it? I wish to stop the barrooms in this city and in the District of Columbia just as I would stop a gaming house in the city of Washington and the District of Columbia. I object to them; my constituents object to them, in my judgment. I wish my constituents, when they come to their National Capital, to see cut out of the city a line of conduct that they consider highly improper and objectionable.

To whom am I responsible—to the residents who moved in here and who live here or to the people at home in my own State who sent me here; to the people here from my State who must come here if they take office under the National Government or to resident citizens disconnected with governmental duties?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not see that the Senator from Georgia reaches the vital part of my suggestion. In his own State the Senator has stated that, although the legislature and the governor had complete power, that legislature chose to submit the question of prohibition to the people who were affected rather than to themselves pass upon it. Now, as a parallel, why can not this Congress submit the question to the people who are affected? This proposed legislation is not for the benefit of the President, it is not for the benefit of Senators, it is not for the benefit of the Members of the House of Representatives who are temporarily here, but it is for the benefit of the people who live in the District of Columbia. Why should these people be denied the right which is exercised by the people who are constituents of the Senator in Georgia? Not simply people resident here, but, under the terms of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], all those living here are to be permitted to cast a ballot and to decide whether or not they want regulation or whether they prefer prohibition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Nebraska may not accept my argument as sound, but I am sure he understands it. This District was set apart for the officers of the United States and those connected with the Government of the United States temporarily living here, responding to their people at home; and the Constitution provides that Congress shall regulate and legislate for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the great difference between the case presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the case before the Senate is that in the case of the legislature the submission is to all of the people interested in the question, while in this case it is proposed to submit it to only a part of them, and that a very small part.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In other words, the people of the United States are interested in the question, and not merely the people of this District; and the Government is charged with the duty to protect its employees here and to legislate for them. In my opinion, if a submission were made to the people of the District it should exclude the resident citizens and be limited to those in official positions. The objection to that is that the officials in office change rapidly; but if there is to be a submission at all, it should be to the people in the States at home, whose District it is, whose Capital it is, who send their people here to hold office.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to read——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me a suggestion, I think there is another difference between the situation here and that to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] refers. That is the inherent difference in the two governments, the States being Commonwealths of unlimited power, except as limitations appear in their constitutions, and this government being one of delegated power and possessing no power whatever except that which is expressly delegated or carried by necessary implication.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado. The more you consider it the more complete you find the difference to be.

Now, Mr. President, if I wanted to put barrooms in the District and saw I was whipped in the Senate and in the House, I would vote for the referendum; but, as I do not want them here, I will not vote for it.

I desire to read from a recent report of a joint select committee of the two Houses appointed pursuant to an act of Congress of March 3, 1915:

> The Constitution of the United States of America in clause 17 of section 8 gives Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."
> The expressed provision of "exclusive legislation" necessarily makes the control of this body of land known as the District of Columbia vest in the National Government and makes this highest national power the government of this Federal District.
> Bitter experience in the former capitals of the United States had caused the framers of our Constitution to place its central seat of government in a location where the national authority would be supreme, where its records and its representatives could be safe from attack and where under its own direction a structural plan for upbuilding and maintenance could be commenced and continued without interruption by any lesser or local authority.
> In fixing the Distict of Columbia as the National Capital and home of the Government, the Congress did not proceed by capture, condemnation, or any other arbitrary method. It acquired political dominion by cession from the States of Maryland and Virginia, and ownership of the land by private contract, and when all of this had been done by mutual understanding and definite written agreement and conveyances from the proprietors of the land, it laid out a National Capital and began its construction.
> Everyone who has purchased property within the District of Columbia since has done so with the knowledge and distinct understanding that the people of the United States had made the power of Congress over the territory exclusive. Everyone who has since adopted the city of Washington as his home has done so with notice that it was beyond even the power of Congress to escape the burden or evade the duty imposed by the Constitution, and when he became a resident of Washington, or acquired property in the District of Columbia, he put himself voluntarily within the Government reservation and subject to such control as the conveniences and necessities of Congress in administering the National Government and building the National Capital might render necessary.
> Here, in addition to the Executive and his Cabinet, the Supreme Court and other Federal courts, and the Congress of the United States, are over 40,000 employees of the Federal Government. These persons, drawn from every State in the Union, with their families compose a large part of the population of the District.
> Here come every day almost thousands of visitors, young and old, to all of whom the lessons of patriotism resulting from a visit to the Nation's Capital result in a higher type of citizenship, and the pride of participation in the affairs of our Government grows stronger with the realization of its latent power and outward dignity and grandeur.

Let me stop a moment to say that as they come I want them to see that the National Congress at the National Capital has closed barrooms, has forbidden the sale of liquor, and I want them to go back from here with the inspiration of knowing that their national legislators are helping them in the fight which, pray God, will close such places everywhere, from ocean to ocean, and from the Lakes to the Gulf.

> The protection to life and property, the measures to secure health, happiness, and the benefits of education, as well as the measures for the care of the poor and the sick, are beneficial not alone to the actual residents of the District of Columbia, but to all the American people between the great oceans.

Mr. President, I insist that the District of Columbia is the District of the people from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf; that the Constitution provides that the Senators and Representatives from the States shall rule it and regulate it in the interest of all the people; and I am utterly unwilling to abrogate my responsibility and refer it back to the District. I wish to see the barrooms closed; I wish to see the sale of liquor for beverage purposes stopped here, and to my constituents at home I hold myself responsible, and I vote what I believe to be their wishes, accepting the responsibility myself and declining to refer it to anybody else.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as two Senators have spoken against the referendum, and I propose to occupy a few minutes along the same line, I think it but right that I should yield and permit any Senator on the other side now to occupy a little time, if any Senator desires to do so. Does the Senator from Missouri wish to speak on that side of the question?

Mr. REED. I desired to ask the Senator from Georgia just one question before he took his seat.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Georgia states that he is opposed to and desires to close the barrooms. That, of course, is one question. Does the Senator think, under the terms of this bill, if, for instance, a Pan American Congress should be held here, to which representatives should come from South American countries and a banquet were held, that even so much as a glass of wine could be served at that banquet?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not sure, Mr. President; but I am willing to say that if they should come here and be given a banquet without a glass of wine, and sent home with the knowledge that that was the sentiment of the American people, I think it would do them good. I would not object to serving the glass of wine at the banquet; I want to be candid; but if the bill prevents it I do not think it will do any harm.

Mr. REED. I just wanted the Senator to understand, if he did not, that, of course, there is a very great difference between prohibiting the sale of liquor at saloons and prohibiting the use of liquor, a glass of wine, or something of that sort at a hotel, at a dinner, or at a banquet. The Senator recognizes that difference, because he has frankly stated it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do, frankly.

Mr. REED. Now, if we are to deny the right of a citizen or a hotel to serve a glass of wine, does the Senator believe that we ought to permit the existence in the District of Columbia of large alcohol distilleries and allow them to sell their liquor all over the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it would be possible or proper for us to stop the manufacture of alcohol in the United States. I do not think that the suppression of the manufacture and use of spirituous liquors for beverage purposes should be carried to the extent of forbidding the use of alcohol in manufacturing, in the arts, and in other lines where it is necessary. It is the beverage feature of it that I am after, and, above all, what I am after is the barroom.

Mr. REED. But if the alcohol is manufactured in this District and shipped abroad, does the Senator know any way in which it can be prevented, under this bill, from being purchased and used by a distiller for use in the manufacture of whisky?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not investigated that question at all.

Mr. REED. Now, while we are purifying the District, why not stop making alcohol to send into other States to poison the people of other States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator. If he will prepare a bill to stop interstate commerce in all kinds of spirituous liquors, anywhere and everywhere, I will vote for it.

Mr. REED. We are dealing now with the question of the District of Columbia, not with the general question. As for that suggestion of the Senator, I think the Supreme Court answered it yesterday, if the newspaper accounts of the opinion are correct. I have not read the opinion, but it seems to be to the effect that where a State has prohibited a citizen of a State from receiving liquor the law can be made effective, and is made effective. That is what the newspaper accounts of the opinion say. I do not want to be understood as saying that I am absolutely correct. I assume that I am. If that is true, every State of the Union has the power to-day to make that State absolutely bone-dry, as we say. Now, does the Senator think there is any such law as that in existence in any State except Arizona?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not in existence in Georgia. I hope they will make it bone-dry this next summer.

Mr. REED. Are not the citizens of the Senator's own State permitted to import liquor for their own use under the laws of the State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is true. The bill was passed, I think, under a misapprehension of the meaning of the Webb Act. They were of the opinion, so I was advised, that they could not absolutely prohibit it and remain within the Constitution; but I feel perfectly sure that this summer they will stop it. At least, I hope so. In other words, I am in favor of stopping men from using it, not simply playing with it. I want to say that to the Senator. I am in favor of trying to make it bone-dry.

Mr. REED. The Senator is taking a ground now that is very seldom taken, but which in my opinion is the only logical ground. It seems to me sheer nonsense to prohibit somebody from selling and not at the same time to prohibit an individual from buying. But that being the case, I can not understand the Senator, since he takes that ground, being willing to retain in the District of Columbia a distillery or distilleries which make large quantities of alcohol here and allow them to ship that material into the States, well knowing, as the Senator, of course, must know, and as we all know, that part of it may be used for mechanical purposes, part of it may be used for medicinal purposes, and part of it may be used for the purpose of manufacturing intoxicants. If we are going to get so good, if we are going to express our purity of heart and exaltation of soul particularly in the District of Columbia, why not stop the manufacture of alcohol within this District?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I profess no superior purity of heart or exaltation of soul above other people.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator does not. I am not referring to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With me opposition to the use of spirituous and intoxicating drink has been a gradual growth. When I leave myself free to think about it and realize the skeletons found in almost every home as a result of its use, I have reached the place where I am willing never to have it on my table any more, although I enjoy a glass of wine myself; and I am willing in my State and hope in my State this next summer to help make it absolutely dry, and I hope the people are really willing to do it. If they are not, then I do not think it is worth a great deal.

Mr. REED. I want to submit this to the Senator. I want to be understood. I stated the other day very clearly here on the floor that I held no brief to defend the liquor interests, and I did not. I asked the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] a few questions and discussed a few principles, and it seems to have been sent out all over the country that I had made a bitter speech in favor of wide-open saloons, or something of that sort. I will say to the gentlemen in the gallery, in all kindness, that I hope that will not be repeated to-day. But does the Senator know of a city in the United States the size of Washington where they have a law similar to this?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I really do not know. The largest one I know about is my own city of Atlanta, but I suppose there are larger ones.

Mr. REED. Is there any difficulty in enforcing it there?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, the State of Michigan, I think, by 70,000 majority has enacted a State prohibitory law. The city of Detroit is in that State, and it is a city twice as large as Washington.

Mr. REED. The law is not yet in effect, is it?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but it has been passed upon by the people.

Mr. REED. I believe it is not in effect. Now, what I was coming to was this: Being a very ardent believer in temperance, and desiring as heartily as the Senator does to see the evil of intemperance eradicated, there yet arises the question of the best way to accomplish that.

The Senator himself states that he was for a long time an earnest believer in local option. The District of Columbia is 10 miles square. How long does the Senator think it will be until just outside of this District there will be every conceivable kind of doggery, and a probable wave of criminality, which usually follows those things? Is there not a real danger in that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator. Over on the Virginia side I do not think we will have it. Over on the Maryland side, if it starts, I believe those good people will suppress it.

Mr. REED. They have not suppressed it in their own State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not entirely, no; but I think they have local option now in the counties of Maryland.

Mr. REED. Not adjoining the District.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think they have put it into effect, but I think they have the right to do it; and I believe that these doggeries of the kind the Senator has in view—his idea was places of a very low order, the very worst order?

Mr. REED. Yes; I am afraid of them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not believe the people in those counties would tolerate them. I think they will run them out, and I think the "dry" territory will spread. I hope so.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to get the Senator's views of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I simply wish to mention, in conclusion, the fact that this report from which I read is the report of the joint committee of which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] was chairman.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there are just 10 minutes remaining until 2 o'clock. I will say to my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that if he desires to occupy that time, or anyone else in favor of the referendum wishes the time, I shall be glad to yield and take 5 minutes after the hour of 2 o'clock has been reached.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator for his courtesy; but I do not think there is anything that I desire to say that I will not have an opportunity to say under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will, then, take a few minutes in presenting my view of this matter.

We have before us a petition said to have been signed by 40,000 people in the District of Columbia. The Senator from Alabama does not know whether they are men, women, or children; neither do I, nor does any other Senator.

I challenged the first page of the petition upon first glance, saying that, in my judgment, the signatures were made by the same person. If anybody will take the Declaration of Independence and notice the signatures on that document and follow it down in every petition that ever has been presented to Congress from that day to this containing a large number of names and find the same, almost identical, chirography that there is on the page I looked at, I will say that I ought not to have made the observation I did. I do not insist now that the names are signed by the same person, but evidently the same pen and the same ink were used, and the same form of chirography runs down the entire page. It certainly looks suspicious. My attention has been called to subsequent pages. There the identity is not so striking. In some instances manifestly more than one name was signed by the same person, but, as a rule, I think they were signed by different persons. Those doubtless were the sheets that were hung up in the saloons of the District of Columbia, where the man who came in to get a drink was invited to append his signature to the document, which he promptly did. So that those doubtless were signed by different individuals in most instances.

Mr. President, as to a referendum in the District of Columbia, I have been here a long time, and for 22 years I was associated with the Committee on the District of Columbia in one capacity and another. For 10 or 12 years I was chairman of that committee, and I have some knowledge of this District. If there is any binding reason why this matter should be submitted to the people of the District of Columbia for their approval, I can not for the life of me understand why the same argument was not made when the Jones-Works bill was passed upon by the Senate regulating the excise laws of this District and driving out of business a very large number of saloons at that time. I can not see why the bill that was aimed at the "red-light" district ought not to have been submitted to the people of the District of Columbia just as well as this. Why should not the Borland amendment, which the people of the District of Columbia are proclaiming against and denouncing as unfair to the District, have been submitted to the people for their consideration and their approval or disapproval? Why should not the taxation of intangibles, which is now a burning subject in the minds of the people of this District, have been submitted to a referendum rather than to have Congress take the responsibility of passing that law and of imposing that burden, if it be a burden, upon the people without their consent? Why should not the half-and-half proposition, Mr. President, which has been the source of more eloquence perhaps, both in the Senate and outside, than any other proposition that was ever submitted to the Congress of the United States concerning the District of Columbia, have been submitted to the people for their approval or their disapproval? But Congress did not think it was necessary to do so. Congress in its sovereign right legislated on all those questions, and there is no reason why on all other questions concerning the people of this District Congress, in justice to itself, should not also legislate on these questions, including this bill, instead of referring it to a vote of the people.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator; yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has there ever been any referendum of any question to the people of the District of Columbia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not during the past 30 years, during my residence here. I am one of the oldest inhabitants now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator know of any instance where it ever was done, even in prior years?

Mr. GALLINGER. It never has been suggested in 30 years, and I do not now recall any instance in prior years.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. GALLINGER. There may have been some instances of the kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield after I explain. There was a time when they had a municipal government here, a time when they had a governor here, a time when they had a mayor and a common council here, and they may have had some referendum during those years. I do not know as to that. However, I do know that the form of government was changed because of conditions then existing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I just wish to correct the RECORD. The Senator from Colorado was sick when the debate occurred before, and therefore did not hear the debate; but if he will refer to the debate he will find that I stated in the RECORD at that time that there were instances of a referendum in the District, and I cited them. One of the most marked was a referendum on the question as to whether Alexandria County and Alexandria city should be ceded back to the State of Virginia, which was submitted to the people to determine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, however that may be, there has not been any referendum since the organic act was passed which has governed this city for more than 30 years, and I see no reason why there should be an exception made in this instance.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the organic law was the result of a referendum vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Even if so it does not change my statement in the least.

Mr. President, I have had more or less knowlegde of six elections that have occurred in the District of Columbia since I have been in public life. Those six elections were when the people of this District elected, or tried to elect, delegates to the several national conventions of the political parties in this country, and if anybody wants to see another election of that kind in the District of Columbia I certainly do not. They were governed by regulations just as strict as the regulations in this bill, and yet those so-called elections were so notorious that the cry of fraud was raised from the first hour that they were balloting until the ballots closed, and they were so outrageously notorious that the Republican national committee refused to receive any delegates from the District of Columbia in their last national convention.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator for information, because I do not know what the fact is. Were those elections governed by statutes of Congress?

Mr. GALLINGER. They were not, but they were governed by regulations on the part of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, which were just as strict as any provision there is in this measure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Were they regulations that were enforceable as criminal statutes?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know as to that; very likely not. I do not know how far the regulations in this measure are enforceable as criminal statutes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes; there are such provisions.

Mr. GALLINGER. However that may be, the regulations were just as strict as the provisions in this amendment, and there was provided a careful supervision of those elections by those in authority; and yet the ballot boxes were stuffed, repeating was notorious, and nobody believed that the men who were declared elected had been honestly elected by the men who voted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Is it not a fact that they finally cleaned up the situation by burning the ballot boxes?

Mr. GALLINGER. That was done on one occasion, and perhaps on more than one occasion. I think that was the proper way to do it on all those occasions. I went to the polling places and witnessed what was going on.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not understand. Were they Republican primaries?

Mr. GALLINGER. They were Democratic primaries and Republican primaries likewise. One was as bad as the other, and both were as bad as they could be.

Now, Mr. President, to my judgment, with the knowledge I have of the District of Columbia and the character of the voting we would get under the provisions of this bill, I believe the whole scheme to be impracticable and unworkable, and I hope that the Senate will not commit itself to the proposition that a question of this momentous importance should be submitted to the people of the District of Columbia, when they have no proper machinery for elections, when they have been denied the right of suffrage on every other question that comes before them, this particular bill being singled out and made an exception to the rule.

I have believed for 20 years that the people of the District of Columbia ought to be given suffrage. I believe that they ought to be represented in the Congress of the United States; but most of the gentlemen who are arguing for a referendum on this question to-day, giving them the right of suffrage, would not agree with me in the proposition that I have just stated, any more than they would agree with me on the question of woman suffrage, which is in this bill.

Just a word more and I am done. The hour of 2 o'clock being reached, I will take my five minutes now to which I am entitled on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is three minutes. The Senate is proceeding now under the three-minute rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Five minutes on the bill and three minutes on any amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Chair rule that the substitute is to be treated as an amendment under the agreement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not know there was an amendment of that kind pending.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire while this amendment is pending if a Senator may speak five minutes on the bill or must he confine himself to three minutes on the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would rule, subject to being overruled by the Senate, that the five-minute rule is to be applied only while the bill is pending after the amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. KENYON. It can not be applied until all the amendments have been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will take my three minutes now on the amendment. I say that in the matter of a referendum the friends of temperance would be tremendously handicapped in the District of Columbia. There are about 300 public saloons in this District and there are probably nearly 200 other places where alcoholic liquors are manufactured and sold. All these places would be actively at work against the proposed law. In addition, there are doubtless between four and five hundred owners of premises where the traffic is carried on, and all those people will be actively opposed to the law that is proposed by the Senator from Texas, because they have a personal interest in the matter. So I say if it should go to a referendum there will be a handicap upon the friends of temperance that very likely would defeat their wishes.

Mr. President, the so-called petitions, hanging as they did in every saloon in the District of Columbia, signed by men coming into those saloons, are a suggestion to us that those men will use all the influence, all the power, and all the money necessary to defeat the bill if it is to be voted on by the people.

Therefore, I say, Mr. President, the friends of temperance in the Senate must beware and not submit a question of this kind largely to the very men who are engaged in the traffic, and whose money and influence will be exerted to perpetuate that traffic.

So, Mr. President, holding that view I propose to offer an amendment at the proper time which I will simply ask to have read now, and then I will take my seat. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "voters," in line 21, page 2, of the proposed substitute, insert the following:

Provided, That all persons engaged in the manufacture or sale, wholesale or retail, of alcoholic liquors as defined in this act, and all persons owning or renting premises where alcoholic liquors are sold, wholesale or retail, are hereby disqualified from voting at said election.

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair requests the occupants of the galleries to observe order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the pending amendment be stated. I have not heard it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on December 19 last, as follows:

On page 2, lines 5, 6, and 7, strike out "for beverage purposes or for any other than scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, mechanical, sacramental, or other nonbeverage purposes," and insert in lieu the following: "No alcoholic or other prohibited liquors shall be exported from the District of Columbia into any State or Territory of the United States."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I did not at this time expect to say anything further on this bill, except that I think the statement made here this morning clearly points out the danger of the precedent that we are driving up against. I do not question the sincerity or purpose and the honesty of thought in the views expressed by the great Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]; but both of them have expressed this morning the very thought which I believe is the crux of this situation. The Senator from Georgia said that, as far as he was concerned, if he had his way and intended to submit this question to a vote of anybody in the District, it would not be to the resident citizens; it would not be to those citizens of the United States who pay the taxes and raise the children, who respond to the call of the Nation when it is in danger, who live within this District—good people, true people. No; he would disfranchise them without a question; but if it were to be submitted at all he would submit it to the officeholding bureaucracy which compose a portion of the citizenship of this District, to the officeholders of this District, coming from far States, to determine a question that only on yesterday the Supreme Court of the United States said is a police power which belongs to the government of the States and not to the Federal Government.

Now, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment. I will not say that he offered it for the purpose of prejudicing a case, because, unfortunately, men who are engaged in certain lines of business meet condemnation from certain quarters; but he would offer an amendment here because a few hundred votes in addition——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I realize that it is impossible for me to say what I would like to in three minutes. I will, however, string along on the amendments at different times.

It has been inaccurate, I think, to confine this discussion merely to the relationship of the District of Columbia to this question. This is a part of a great national movement. It is inaccurate to say that prohibition is to become a great issue in this country, because it is a live, active, undodgable issue to-day; an unpleasant one, possibly, for politicians, but one they can not dodge.

One of the greatest leaders of the Democratic Party, three times its candidate for President, Secretary of State under this administration, has declared that he intends to do all he can to write a prohibition plank in the next national platform of the Democratic Party, and when Mr. Bryan, with his wonderful personality, his splendid manhood, his power of oratory, and his courage, with the audiences which he can attract in the American Republic, makes it his business for the next few years to hold up the saloon interests of this country to the gaze of the American people, those who have stock in saloons might as well commence selling it just as quickly as they can. And if he secures the adoption of his "dry" plank in the Democratic platform it will shatter party lines.

It is inconceivable to me why certain portions of our country do not seem able to comprehend the new spirit and movement of this country. I do not mean it in any partisan way, but this question of prohibition is coming up from the West and the Middle West as a great question of social justice and social righteousness. It is more than a moral question; it is likewise an economic one. Very few votes for prohibition will come into the Senate from the eastern section of the country. There are a few bright lights here and there, such as the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], but one thing we have been taught in the last election, which was not to my liking in its result, is that there is a West and a South and that we do not commence to celebrate or pay election debts when the returns are in from the State of New York. Almost a solid East will be recorded for this referendum. Is that because they are so intensely interested in popular government?

Mr. President, there are enough votes in the Senate Chamber representing the people of the United States who have just as much interest in this question——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KENYON. I will continue on the next amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I suggest to my distinguished and amiable friend from New Hampshire that he modify his amendment so that nobody be permitted to vote on this question except duly qualified members of the Antisaloon League.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not wish to discriminate against certain parties whom the Senator represents.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the Senator specify whom he says I represent?

Mr. GALLINGER. I mean to say the Senator represents their side of this controversy.

Mr. HUGHES. In the first place, the Senator might have had the courtesy—for he has been in the Senate long enough—to address the Presiding Officer before interrupting another Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator sought an answer from me. The Senator had better not ask me a question unless he wants an answer.

Mr. HUGHES. I was compelled to seek an answer, after the discourtesy of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. HUGHES. In any event, I know the Senator in his heart would be delighted if he could limit the referendum to the members of his party. The Senator is a partisan, if there is one on the floor of the Senate.

A great deal can be said with reference to the abolition of saloons. There is a great deal of heat. Much more heat than light is generated in this discussion, but it involves more than the abolition of the saloon. This legislation means that our Capital City is to be the only capital city in the civilized world where it will be impossible for foreigners, visitors, sojourners in our land, to eat and drink according to the customs of the countries from which they come. It will be impossible for a Frenchman and his family to drink a bottle of claret at their dinner. It will be impossible for a German with his family to drink a glass of lager beer with their meal in a public place. In other words, it means not only the abolition of the saloon, not only the destruction of the straw man which these gentlemen have laboriously built up in order that they might destroy him, but it means a vital interference with the intimate daily personal affairs of hundreds of thousands of citizens; and then we are treated to the spectacle of men who have gone up and down this country——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HUGHES. If permitted under the unanimous-consent agreement, I should like to speak for five minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill is under consideration, after the amendments have been disposed of, the Senator will be recognized, and he can then speak for five minutes.

Mr. HUGHES. I understood that the Senator from New Hampshire exercised that privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; that was not the case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am in favor of this bill, and I am opposed to the substitute presented. The sentiment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has referred to as being so overwhelming is due to an evolution in the minds of the people as they are enlightened as to the detrimental effect of the use of intoxicating liquors. There was a time when a man could manufacture his own whisky. There was a time when there was no internal-revenue tax laid upon the manufacture of it. There was a time when there were less restrictions and when there were no licenses, and then when licenses required only a small payment. But as each step has been taken the realization of the people has been that the greatest curse this country has ever had or the people of the world have ever had is the work of the saloon and the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. That is what has caused the sentiment and what has caused the change in the situation as to submission.

There was a time when legislators would not think of submitting the question of prohibition to the people of a State. Oh, no. You must take it to a community; you must take it to a county. There was a time when a city council could not submit it to the entire city, but would submit it simply to a ward of that city or to a precinct of that city. But as the evil has been shown, as the detrimental effect of the use of liquor has been demonstrated, as its effect upon civilization has been made clear there has been this enormous sentiment which the Senator from Iowa has so graphically described.

Mr. President, it is true that States now submit the question, but when they realize the fact of the pernicious effect will it not go in the same line with everything else that is of such a nature which is conceded to be of that character? We do not submit the question of the sale of opium to the people of the District, because universally it is conceded to be detrimental, and yet the use of opium is not as detrimental in the way it is used at the present time as the use of intoxicating liquors. We do not submit the question of gambling to the people, and yet some of the highest minded men in the world have gambled. There is no question of that, but it has been made clear that it is immoral to do it; that as a matter of fact its detrimental effects upon the people who handle the money produces embezzlement. If we do not submit such questions to the people of the District, why should we submit the question involved? The District of Columbia was created for the express purpose of having the Congress legislate for the city containing the Capital of the Nation. All citizens of the Republic have an interest in the good order of society here and they should have the right through their Representatives of determining whether saloons should exist at the National Capital which might extend their evil influence to the 40,000 employees of the Government here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to express the hope that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will be voted down. It was never intended by this bill to penalize or destroy a legitimate industry. It is entirely permissible to use alcohol for industrial and scientific purposes. If that use should not be permitted hospitals would be without the most beneficent agencies for the relief of pain, laboratories would be without the means of modern analysis and experimentation, pharmacists would be deprived of an indispensable agency for the preservation and compounding of drugs.

The evil consequences which the Senator pictures are entirely imaginary. If alcohol is shipped into territory governed by prohibitory laws they will take care of the situation. If it is shipped into territory already wet no law will be violated.

I trust the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to explain to the Senate that I have a pair on this bill with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. The Senator from Wisconsin is absent on account of the illness of his wife and son. He and I look upon the measure differently. I am in favor of the Sheppard bill for prohibition. I am opposed to a referendum upon this item. I would favor a general referendum, perhaps, but not on an item singled out. The Senator from Wisconsin is in favor of it. Therefore there is no vote lost, and out of courtesy to the Senator from Wisconsin, for the second time since I have been a Member of the Senate, I am paired.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything further with reference to this amendment and should not have done so except for the remarks of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. This bill, introduced by the Senator, is bottomed upon the idea that the use of intoxicating liquors is an unmixed evil and therefore Congress ought to prohibit the sale of all kinds of intoxicating liquors within the District, including alcohol, save that the sale of alcohol within the District is permitted for medicinal and mechanical purposes.

Yet the Senator and those associated with him who talk about wanting to make the Capitol of the Union a sort of holy of holies and an example to all the world, insist upon protecting the only large alcohol-producing factory in the District, a concern that has gone into the public press with display advertisements. I call attention to one in the Washington Post of January 6, on page 4.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator read the uses of alcohol given there?

Mr. REED. I have not time to read it. I know that alcohol is used for many good purposes, but the trouble is when you allow it to be made in this city it can be shipped into any other territory and then used for bad purposes. Since we are engaged in the business of extermination, we ought not to make Washington the habitat of an institution of that kind. Everybody knows that it can be made here by tens of thousands of gallons and sold outside the District and be ultimately manufactured into whisky. Now, this is put forward as a moral question. Let it be so considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to a letter to Corby Bros., of the District of Columbia, from Nelson, Baker & Co., manufacturing chemists, Detroit, Mich, with offices at 930 Broadway, Kansas City, and ask that this letter be read. It is an illustration of the use of alcohol for medicinal purposes, as provided for by this bill, the application for the alcohol coming from a firm with an office in the Senator from Missouri's own State. This shows how unfortunate it would be to adopt his amendment, which would interfere so largely with the concededly legitimate and appropriate use of alcohol produced by this manufacturing concern in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator request that the letter be printed in the RECORD or that it be read?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., February 16, 1916.

The CORBY CO.,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: At a recent convention of the manufacturers of medicinal products in New York we were advised by some of the members that you were manufacturers of alcohol, but that you restricted your sales to manufacturers who used alcohol for medicinal purposes only, and that you accordingly made very attractive prices.

All the alcohol purchased by us is used only for the manufacture of medicinal products, and we would like to have you quote us in carload lots.

We inclose stamped self-addressed envelope and thank you in advance for a reply.

Yours, very truly,

NELSON, BAKER & CO.,
F. W. KEYSER.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in casting my vote against this amendment I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposed to the legislation if it were possible to pass the bill with it in this body and perhaps in the other House. I think it can be said with some truth that there is an inconsistency in protecting any manufacturer if we are going to have prohibition.

In my State, Mr. President, more than a quarter of a century ago when the question of prohibition was up for discussion we enacted legislation and placed it in the constitution of our State, and we eradicated not only the saloon but all those institutions where intoxicating liquor was being manufactured, and it has had no bad results. But I understand perfectly well, and I have been told by the friends of the measure, or, rather, by those who have the measure in charge, that it might endanger the passage of the bill to place the provision offered by the Senator from Missouri in the bill. For that reason, and for that reason only, I shall vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have offered an amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the amendment was not agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and therefore an amendment to that amendment is not in order, but probably will be in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let me understand that ruling. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama, the Senator will remember, was rejected as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has reserved——

Mr. GALLINGER. The right to present it in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The right to present it in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, strike out the words "wine, ale, porter, beer," so that if amended it will read:

Wherever the term "alcoholic liquors" is used in this act it shall be deemed to include whisky, brandy, rum, gin, cordials, hard or fermented cider, alcoholic bitters, ethyl alcohol, all malt liquors, and all other alcoholic liquors.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it has just occurred to me during the course of the debate that, in as much as there is apparently wide divergence of opinion among the Senators, a compromise might be reached, whereby the good people of the District would not be denied those privileges which are enjoyed by the men and women of Europe to have at their meals, wherever they may take their meals, whether it be in residence, club, or hotel, light wines or light beers, which the experience of Europe teaches us are not, in practice, intoxicating. There are in Spain bodegas, where they sell nothing but wine and beer. There seems to be a very general sentiment, growing daily in this country, that the use of spirituous liquors highly charged with alcohol is detrimental to the public health and morals; but I do not think it is charged that light beers or wines have such effect. The light wine contains not more than 14 per cent alcohol, whereas whiskies, brandies, and cordials are all alcohol. Beer does not contain more than 4 per cent alcohol. Therefore, I submit, if there is a desire in this body to meet the objections of a very large number of good people who desire to continue the privilege in this free land of enjoying light wines and beers with their meals or on any other occasion, that Senators should support this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not like the discrimination in the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. The Senator is proposing to take very good care of California, but he is allowing the hard cider of New England to remain within the prohibition of the bill. Why is that? [Laughter.]

Mr. PHELAN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire what percentage of alcohol is contained in hard cider?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not answer that. I never drank any of it in my life; but there is enough alcohol in hard cider to make it intoxicating, just as there is enough in ale and wine to make people who drink those beverages intoxicated.

Mr. PHELAN. I asked of the learned Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] what percentage of alcohol there is in hard or fermented cider before I submitted this amendment, and he said there was no limit to it, whereas in wine, under the regulation of the Agricultural Department, there is a limit, as I stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is absurd to say that there is no limit to the percentage of alcohol in hard cider. There are different stages of fermentation, of course, and undoubtedly cider becomes an intoxicating beverage when it reaches a certain stage of fermentation. If, however, the Senator from California is going to exempt wine and beer and ale, in which he seems to be interested, to be consistent he ought also to exempt hard cider.

Mr. PHELAN. I will accept the Senator's assurance and suggestion. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well, Mr. President; that affords a stronger reason why I should vote against the Senator's amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JONES. I have understood that the bill had been reported from the Committee of the Whole. If that is true, it seems to me the bill should have been perfected before the Underwood amendment was voted upon as a substitute. My recollection is that the bill has been reported to the Senate and is now in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington is mistaken in regard to that.

Mr. JONES. Of course, it is open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and is open to amendment.

Mr. JONES. How does it happen, then, that we voted upon the substitute proposed by the Senator from Alabama before the bill was perfected?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Underwood amendment was voted upon by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The bill still remained before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole after the Underwood amendment was defeated.

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that the RECORD shows differently; but I have not had time to look the matter up.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, it seems to me that this bill is sure to pass this body, to the shame and the humiliation of the great Senate of the United States. If the bill is to pass, I urge that we pass it rightly. Let us make this Capital a model city, a real nice city, a city not only free from liquor, but also free from tobacco fumes, free from cigarettes, cigars, and pipes; a city free from the quids of tobacco and of expectorated tobacco juice. Millions of hard money are spent each year in this unfortunate habit. It pollutes God's free air; it is surely no benefit to man. The argument against the sale of liquor and against the use of liquor has been that it had no food value. God knows there is no food value in tobacco. Let us therefore abolish the use of it.

I have here an amendment, Mr. President, which I wish to offer at the proper place in this bill, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That on and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia to offer for sale, to vend, barter, or give tobacco in any form whatever, and that to smoke, chew, or snuff on any street, alley, or highway, or in any public building in the District of Columbia shall be unlawful and shall be punished by a fine of $50, and for a second violation of this provision of this act the penalty shall be doubled, and so on ad infinitum.

I offer that amendment in all sincerity. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. President, I want to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. The Chair has already admonished occupants of the galleries that order must be preserved therein, and that the Chair must enforce the rules of the Senate. Upon further display of applause or an attempt to show the feelings of occupants of the galleries during this discussion the Chair will order the galleries or such part of them as he may designate cleared. The Chair will not again warn occupants of the galleries, but will act in the matter.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I trust the time occupied by the Chair will not be taken out of my time.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I feel that I am fortunate in the fact that my lips have never been polluted with tobacco in any form whatever. I can see no value in it. I realize that many of my fellow Senators—indeed, almost all of them—obtain infinite pleasure out of the habit of using tobacco. In God's name and in the interest of humanity, in the interest of God's free and sweet air, in the interest of thousands of weak and puny boys and men, sniffing and sucking on the end of a cheroot or of a little cigarette, I ask you to make the self-sacrifice, you from Georgia, you from South Carolina, and other parts of the country, who represent fortunes in money as well as the comfort physically of chewing the noxious weed.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question before the Senate now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, may I ask when my amendment may be offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's amendment may now be offered.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have presented the amendment in all seriousness. I am so utterly and absolutely opposed to this narrow thought of prohibition that I confess I am unable to find words adequately to express my feeling. I am willing to believe that many of my friends are conscientious in this matter. I say that this great loud cry for humanity, while it may in many instances be interpreted as for humanity, may also be interpreted as political ambition. I say that prohibition laws, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], do not prohibit. I say that advisedly, and I shall present some newspaper clippings showing that fact, which I shall ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The Senator from Georgia says he is opposed to the open bar. I say substitute something better for the open bar before you abolish it. All mankind were not born alike nor are they blessed with like surroundings. I ask the Senator, in all seriousness, is an open room, in which men sit in a gilded palace and drink whisky or beer or wine, any better than the open bar? And yet right within the Commonwealth of Georgia open rooms are maintained, where men sit and drink whisky and beer and everything else they desire.

I say that in Georgia, in Kansas, and in almost every other prohibition State there are more arrests for drunkenness than elsewhere, and your prohibition laws are futile and a failure.

I want to answer the remark made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] in relation to some young woman rising and asking a question at that meeting. The Senator said, "Oh, yes; she was a brave little woman"; that she must have been brave to have been in such a crowd as was there. Does the Senator know what he is talking about? I was there, and I say that the so-called crowd at Poli's Theater was as dignified, as conscientious, as upright, and as orderly a body as I ever saw. It would compare favorably with any body——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. One moment, sir. That it would compare favorably with any body that has ever been gathered together within the pale of Mississippi or of any other Commonwealth. There was an orderly set of men and women gathered there to plead and press for their rights as they saw them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I rise to a question of personal privilege. The Senator from New Jersey picks me out every time he gets up——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; I do not yield to the Senator, if it is to be taken out of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not prevent interruptions being taken out of the Senator's time.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Then, I decline to yield further, if the interruption may not be deducted from my time. I do not think the Senator should take my time. I do not think the Senator should interrupt me. I think he is a very delightful, lovable gentleman, but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to raise a point of order. My point of order is that there is no amendment pending; that no amendment has been stated from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has offered an amendment, which the Secretary is awaiting an opportunity to read.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I rise to a question of personal privilege, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am perfectly willing to stand by what I say and pay the penalty of my act, but I must not be asked to suffer for that which I have not said or done. I made no uncomplimentary reference to the audience at Poli's Theater. I am sure it was a characteristic Washington audience. I do not know what the reporter recorded me as saying, but what I did say or intended to say was that she must have been a brave little women to have entered her protest in that particular audience.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator said "in that crowd," if I am not mistaken. I will ask for a reading of the RECORD.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I decline to be interrupted by my amiable and kind-hearted and always interesting friend from New Jersey. What I meant to say was that the jury was evidently packed and their minds were made up before they went to the opera house, and anyone who had the courage to stand up and stem that tide of disfavor which she would inevitably encounter by protesting as she did, must have been a very brave and patriotic little woman.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Insert in the bill at the proper place the following words:

And be it further enacted, That on and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia to offer for sale, to vend, barter, or give tobacco in any form whatever, and that to smoke, chew, or snuff on any street, alley, or highway or in any public building in the District of Columbia shall be unlawful and shall be punished by fine of $50, and for a second violation of this provision of this act the penalty shall be doubled, and so on ad infinitum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate and still open to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute, being the amendment proposed by me as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask unanimous consent that the reading of the proposed amendment be dispensed with. We have all read it, and it has been discussed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senate that the amendment is the same as that voted on as in Committee of the Whole, except that there are one or two verbal changes. Several sentences began without the word "that," and that word has been inserted. Also the sections of the amendment have been renumbered, so as to avoid saying "section a" or "section b." Outside of that the amendment is the same as proposed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Alabama will turn to page 2 of his proposed amendment, as I hold it in my hand, the last word, in line 16, "has," evidently ought to be "have."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not find the word "has" there.

Mr. GALLINGER. The word "has" is in my draft of the amendment, although I do not know that I have the last copy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that that language was placed in the bill by an amendment offered on the floor by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] amending the language of the bill. Of course, I did not change the language of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. It manifestly ought to be "have," I will say to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am inclined to think it ought to be "have"; and, unless there is objection, I will ask that that change be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 16, on page 2, it is proposed to change the verb "has" to "have."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the proposed substitute be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the reading of the proposed substitute be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that course will be taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now I submit the amendment suggested by me a while ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment to the proposed substitute of the Senator from Alabama, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. After the word "voters," in line 21, page 2, it is proposed to amend by inserting the following:

Provided, That all persons engaged in the manufacture or sale, wholesale or retail, of alcoholic liquors as defined in this bill, and all persons owning or renting premises where alcoholic liquors are sold, wholesale or retail, are hereby disqualified from voting at said election.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss that amendment. The language is plain and unmistakable, and I think it ought to be agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as I said a while ago, it is a sad day for the people of this country when we face conditions that prevail in darkest Russia. It has often been thrown in my face that I represent somebody or something on this question because I stand for what I think is right. I hold a brief for no man and have no man's dollar in my pocket in connection with this or any other matter and never have had, but I am surprised when I see a distinguished Senator like the Senator from New Hampshire, on a proposition to submit a question to citizens of the United States involving their property and their business, regardless of whether they are right or wrong in conducting that business, and regardless of the question whether that business is right or wrong, seeking to disqualify them. Men engaged in this business are not disfranchised under the law when it comes to an election of President of the United States. The Senator would not go to his own State and attempt to disfranchise every man in it from voting for governor of the State who has taken a drink of whisky, and the man who sells that whisky is no more reprehensible than the man who drinks it, if it is a moral question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have but three minutes, and I ask the Senator not to interrupt me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I do say that for Senators of the United States, because they may think certain men in a certain business should not be approved in their business and that the business should not be approved, to stand here and put the brand of Cain on the brows of those men is a thing that is only worthy of the tyranny of a Russian Government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to speak to the merits of the bill at this time, but I rise simply to express the hope that the amendment offered by my good friend, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], may not be adopted. I am not fighting the saloon keeper. I have none other than the kindliest feelings for him personally. In all the walks of life and in the bosom of his home I wish him well. As a matter of fact, I have had among that class of people some of the best friends and have known some of the truest men that ever blessed the life of man with their friendship. I knew a man once engaged in the saloon business who was a gallant soldier, a loving father, kind husband, and a friend whose loyalty was without variableness or shadow of turning.

I am reminded in this connection of the reply made by Tom Paine when asked to vote for the resolution to behead the King of France. "I did not come to France," said Paine, "to kill monarchs, but rather to destroy monarchy." That is the motive which inspires and moves me in this matter.

No; I am not fighting the saloon keeper, but I am fighting the pernicious traffic in which he is engaged. The saloon business, not alone in America but throughout the world, has been tried in the court of public opinion and convicted, the jury has rendered its verdict, and the court is now about to pronounce the sentence of extermination. If the amendment offered by the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] shall be voted down and Senators brought face to face with the main question, that will be sufficient to insure the passage of this bill and close the saloons in this city of Washington without disqualifying for the higher privileges of citizenship or in any way putting odium upon the men who happened to be engaged in the saloon business. It is my purpose in opposing the so-called Underwood amendment and supporting this bill to help my fellow man and do no man an injury.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of what has occurred, I withdraw the amendment. I think it has served its purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, of course no one could question the motives of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], than whom there is not in the public service a more high-minded and a more patriotic man. Those of us who have had the honor of serving with him in the House of Representatives can bear testimony to his lofty purposes and high character. But, Mr. President, I am going to vote against this referendum, proposed by the Senator from Alabama, not because I doubt the intelligence or the patriotism of the people of the District of Columbia but because Congress is extending this privilege to the citizens of the District and all other citizens temporarily residing here merely as a courtesy, and the people of the District of Columbia have no power or authority to see that the referendum, when once expressed, is given force and effect. They have no means of knowing that their will at the polls will be respected by Congress and, whatever the verdict may be, the election framed to test public opinion would have no binding effect upon future Congresses, and, if the people of the District in the exercise of this special privilege should come into collision with the wishes of Congress the lawmaking body would brush aside their verdict as of no binding force or effect.

In a municipality the electorate determines its will by referendum or other method and has the constitutional power to enforce public sentiment. If the common council fails to heed the popular verdict at the polls, a new council will be chosen by the electorate in harmony with its wishes, and frequently when constituted municipal government fails to carry out the public will those in authority are recalled and new officers put in their places. If the legislature of a State sees fit to submit to the people a great public question by referendum and the people decide that question at the polls, the legislature must give effect to such a mandate without hesitation or delay, or the people will elect a new legislature which will obey the public will.

Mr. President, there is not a Senator upon this floor who will for one moment contend that this referendum proposed for the District of Columbia would bind the new Congress about to assume authority. A public expression can not be tested here until after this Congress has passed into history. If a referendum vote should now be taken the proponents of prohibition would press their cause with increased vigor, and the referendum would not be effective in establishing the ultimate will of Congress.

Upon the previous vote taken upon this question the amendment of the Senator from Alabama was defeated by a tie vote in the Senate, and even the author of that amendment was not satisfied and is to-day testing the Senate's attitude regarding his measure with the same force and vigor that was displayed when it failed of passage because of a tie a few weeks ago. If the vote in the District of Columbia should be close, and it might be close, the friends of temperance here and the friends of this measure throughout the country would not be satisfied with such a verdict as the expression of the national will. Therefore, Mr. President, to save a possible disagreement between Congress and the citizens of the District, I think the Senate should exercise its constitutional authority and pass such laws as seem to be wholesome and helpful to the people here, assuming all responsibility therefor. To delay means increased bitterness between the citizens of the District and the national authority, and I am ready to take my share of the responsibility for our action. It has frequently been said when the question of State and National prohibition has been under discussion that public sentiment must be practically unanimous or the law could not be enforced.

It has been argued again and again in different States that prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors meant practically unlimited license to use liquor, and in many States the division has been so sharp between the question of high license and prohibition that the police authority has been seriously hampered in the execution of the law. That, however, can not be said of the District of Columbia. The citizens of the District have no right to vote here. The police authority is under the sole jurisdiction of the Federal Government. There can be but one attitude toward this legislation, and that is that it will be given unqualified effect in this District, where the Federal arm is supreme. And why should not the Capital of the Nation exalt this principle of morality and good conduct? Why should not the National Government within that part of the public domain which it absolutely controls exalt every civic and moral virtue and make of this Federal city the highest ideal of our national hopes and aspirations? I am glad to be privileged to vote in favor of the passage of this bill and give my approval to the principles here involved. If the National Government, with absolute authority in this District, 10 miles square, is unable to enforce the law strictly and impartially, the sooner the country understands the weakness of our system of government the better it will be for our citizenship. Sir, I expect this law to pass; I expect it to be helpful to the cause of temperance everywhere, and I am glad to stand in my place as its advocate and defender.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate because of illness.

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before this vote is taken I wish to state that I believe thoroughly in the principle of the referendum, and am anxious to see it recognized and applied wherever possible. Hence I shall vote against the substitute for the reason, and for the sole reason, that I do not believe that we have the constitutional power to confer that right upon the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have received from the secretary of state of the State of Oregon a resolution on this subject which has just been adopted by the Oregon Legislature. Before the vote is taken I desire to ask that it be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

SALEM, OREG., January 8, 1917.

Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following is transmitted you by direction of the twenty-ninth legislative assembly, senate joint memorial No. 1, to the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Senate of Oregon, respectively represent that—

"Whereas the District of Columbia is under the government and jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States, and the existence of the open saloon at the Capital of the Nation is a menace to the welfare of all the people, and especially to the inhabitants of said District, and an evil example to the Nation; and

"Whereas at least three-fourths of the population of the United States now live in territory where the liquor traffic is prohibited, and the growing convictions of mankind are strongly averse to such traffic and the various evils inseparably connected with it; and

"Whereas our National Capital should be kept free from contaminating influences, as far as possible, not only for the sake of the inhabitants thereof but as an object lesson to the Nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Oregon (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby, memorialized speedily to enact such legislation as will abolish the traffic in intoxicating liquors within the District of Columbia."

Adopted January 8, 1917.

GUS C. MOSER,
President of the Senate.
R. S. STANFIELD,
Speaker of the House.

Please apprise Senator LANE.

BEN W. OLCOTT,
Secretary of State.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, for many years I have been a strong and consistent advocate of allowing the various localities in my own State to decide, each one for itself, whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors should be licensed in their midst, and I see no reason why I should wish to allow that privilege to the people of Pennsylvania and withhold it from the people who reside in the Nation's Capital.

The liquor question is one which comes home to every citizen, and I think it is one that should be decided by the citizens of the locality. For that reason I expect to vote for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama. If that amendment is rejected, as I hope it will not be, I expect to vote for the measure as it has already passed in the Committee of the Whole; but I hope the amendment of the Senator from Alabama will prevail.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I favor on this and all other questions the fundamental principle of local self-government. It is one of the fundamentals of English liberty, and there is no particular legislation on any question, in my opinion, of enough importance to authorize its sacrifice at the hands of the parliamentary body of an English-speaking people.

I am perfectly willing—yea, anxious—that the will of every Commonwealth in this Union on the liquor question shall be carried into legal effect, and it is my purpose to do all in my power, so far as the Federal Government has to do with that question, to accomplish that result in every State and community in the land. But, like the Senator from Pennsylvania, I do not see why this same principle does not apply to the District of Columbia as well as to every State or Territory of the Union on a question of this character.

Senators may argue that under existing law, and under law that has been in effect for more than 30 years, no question has been submitted to the District of Columbia. True; but the answer is that for the first 80 years of this Government, when the fathers who wrote the Constitution, who framed the very provision to which Senators are so fond of referring, were in life and were in control of the affairs of this Government, they thought it proper to commit to local authorities in the District of Columbia the control of its local and police questions.

Mr. President, such a referendum as is proposed here would be persuasive only upon Congress. The Senator from Michigan insisted that such a referendum would not be binding on a subsequent Congress. No; nor is any other law we pass on any subject whatever binding on a future Congress.

There is one other reason—a powerful, practical reason—why such questions ought to be submitted to the will of the electorate of each Commonwealth or of each community to be affected by laws of this character. It is because unless the men in the jury box are prepared to sustain and enforce those laws, it is useless and worse than useless to enact them. During all the history of this District the criminal and civil laws of the District of Columbia have been enforced by juries in this District, inhabitants here, who sit in the court rooms and mete out justice according to their views of law and evidence. I submit to this body that it would be useless—yea, more than useless—to pass laws on a question like this unless the men whose names are in those jury boxes in this District are prepared to enforce them. There has always been local law enforcement here; hence the necessity for knowing whether laws of this character can be enforced, or not, before we enact them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Georgia has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I feel that it is my duty to vote against the substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], first, because this is the Capital of our country, whose control and management is exclusively in the hands of Congress. The people live here largely because this is the Capital of the country. They exist because of the salaries that the General Government disburses out of the money belonging to the United States. It is not simply the home of those who happen to own property here; it is the seat of government, and to it are attracted as temporary residents people from every State in the Union. On every day in the year thousands of nonresidents of the city are here and they feel, as they have a right, that this is their city—their property. They have a right to demand that their representatives shall serve them in administering their interests in this Capital.

I submit that on questions affecting this District it is my duty to vote the same as I would vote on questions affecting my own State. The people of Michigan are interested. They also own, in part, the District; and it is for them, as well as for residents here, that I am commissioned to vote. I can not delegate that responsibility.

Therefore, I feel that I have no right to evade the clear duty of settling this prohibition question for the District of Columbia directly. I am denying no right to the people of Washington. I am simply performing a duty which the Constitution has placed upon me.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I am opposed to the substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. I believe in the principle of self-government, and in the initiative and referendum; and if this were a question of giving to the permanent residents of the District the right to vote upon every question I think I should favor that proposition. But to submit this important moral question only to the voters of the District is against the settled policy of the government of the District under present laws. The responsibility for the government of the District is on Congress and the people of each State are as much interested as the people of the District. The people of our respective States have sent us here to carry out their will on this question as well as all other matters affecting the District.

Under the Constitution and the laws of the United States under which we are acting here now Congress, and Congress alone, the representatives of the 100,000,000 people of the United States, are responsible for conditions in the District of Columbia and we can not rightfully shift that responsibility to a few of the voters here. I am opposed to this referendum particularly, because I do not believe that in a contest that would be waged of this character, with the elements that would enter into it, we could get a fair expression of the voters of the District. With the opportunity for fraud and corruption that would be presented in such an election in the Capital of the Nation affecting the life or death of the liquor business of the entire country we can not contemplate the horrible results which are most likely to follow, judging from our experience with the saloon element of the past. This matter has already been referred to by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], when he spoke of the elections which were held here last spring. I have here an account of the Republican primary, published in the Washington Herald of March 6, 1916, of which I only have time to read the heading, and will ask that the whole article be printed as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON. The heading reads:

Charges of ballot-box stuffing prevent counting of votes—Riots averted—Judge is assaulted—Crowd hoots at members of elections board—Police rescue ballot box—Voters taken to lock up—Hogan declares election gigantic fraud—Two thousand votes in box before poll open.

I send the article to the desk and ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOGAN TICKET BELIEVED TO BE IN LEAD—CHARGES OF BALLOT-BOX STUFFING PREVENT COUNTING OF VOTES—RIOTS AVERTED—JUDGE IS ASSAULTED—CROWD HOOTS AT MEMBERS OF ELECTIONS BOARD—POLICE RESCUE BALLOT BOX—VOTERS TAKEN TO LOCK UP—HOGAN DECLARES ELECTION GIGANTIC FRAUD—TWO THOUSAND VOTES IN BOX BEFORE POLLS OPEN.

Though the votes cast in yesterday's primary for delegates to the Republican National Convention will not be counted until early next week, the few ballot boxes opened and counted last evening indicated Frank J. Hogan and Dr. Edward Williston to be the leaders.

The decision to defer the counting of the ballots came after two hours of conference between the members of the returning board and representatives of the three tickets. Several of the boxes were opened and looked into by the conferees, but no attempt to tally the ballots was made.

After the last box had been deposited with Charles Gertman and Frederic Douglas, two members of the board, the room was ordered cleared. As Chairman Charles Linkins, of the election board, stepped from Mr. Gertman's office, in the Century Building, 412 Fifth Street NW., several alleged adherents of Mr. Hogan attacked him. Three policemen beat them back, and Mr. Linkins was escorted to a room, where he remained until after the crowded corridors were cleared, two hours later. The crowd also spoke ill feeling toward Jesse Foster, a member of the election board, but the policemen protected him.

CHARGES BALLOT STUFFING.

Following the short session of the returning board, its members, who previously had ruled that the candidates could not be present when the vote was counted, sent for them, and they were allowed to sit through the conference.

When the board adjourned, Mr. Hogan made a speech to his adherents who thronged the corridor, stating that yesterday's election was one of the greatest frauds ever committed in the District, but that he had agreed to meet with the returning board when the canvass is made in order to check up their returns with the figures he has received from his personal representatives at the polls yesterday.

Charges of ballot-box stuffing were made by Mr. Hogan, who asserted that in one precinct there were at least 2,000 votes in the box for one of the opposing tickets before 12 o'clock, when the polls were opened.

Mr. Hogan claimed that he should have won by approximately 20 to 1 over the Miller-Chase ticket and by 30 to 1 over the Bradshaw-Marshall ticket.

The Fort Stevens district box showed Hogan-Williston to have carried that section by an overwhelming vote, it standing 225 for them, 3 for Bradshaw-Marshall, and none for Miller-Chase, Hogan said.

RIOT NARROWLY AVERTED.

A riot was narrowly avoided between the Progressive and Old Guard elements in Hillsdale, near Anacostia, last night, when a dispute arose between Attorney Ricks, representing the Miller-Chase faction, and Whitefield McKinley, one of the Hogan ticket judges of election. According to the police, who interfered in time to preserve order and save the ballot box, a crowd had gathered in front of Douglas Hall, Nichols Avenue and Howard Road, when the polls closed, and as McKinley left the building bearing the sealed box, he was accosted by Ricks, who demanded the result of the vote. The police say McKinley wouldn't tell him and an exchange of words followed.

Sergt. Ready, who was standing near, grabbed the sealed box and carried it off, while the rest of the force restored order among the voters, who had gathered and were taking sides. Things were quieted and McKinley and Ricks and the ballot box were taken to the eleventh precinct together. Later the box was taken to the McGill Building, in G Street.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not think it is fair to the people of the United States to allow statements such as have just been made to go in the RECORD without pointing out the fact that they do not apply to this case.

There is no law in the District of Columbia for the holding of a primary election. There is no regulation by law. It is merely a mutual affair of a number of citizens who want to send delegates to a national convention. Under this proposed referendum the machinery of law is applied. The penalties for the violation of the law are included. It has been amended by the Senate and perfected in that regard, and it is a reflection on the citizenship of this District—an intelligent, virtuous, law-abiding citizenship—to contend that under the restrictions of law they will not have as fair and honest an election as they would have in either the State of Kansas or the State of New Hampshire. I do not believe that any intelligent man will assert that to be the fact when he wipes aside the partisanship of the fight that is now taking place in the Senate and looks at the question calmly.

As to the citizenship that compose this District, represented in the gallery to-day, can a man sitting in this Senate look in the faces of these people, anxiously awaiting this verdict on either side, and say that they will indulge in riot and debauchery in exercising the privilege of American citizens, when their elections are properly protected by law, if we give them an opportunity to vote? I do not believe there is a man in the Senate who will look this gallery in the face and make that assertion.

Mr. President, this is not a question of temperance or intemperance. It is a question as to whether about local affairs the people of a portion of the United States shall have the right to exercise the freedom that has been guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States in every State in the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this is an amendment providing for a referendum to the people of the District of Columbia. It was proposed by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He has often proclaimed on this floor his devotion to the principle of the referendum, and to the fundamental principle of the right of the people, especially in local matters, to decide for themselves how they shall be governed. He appeals to the audience in these galleries to-day. Yet when his proposition was presented it provided for excluding one-half of the people of this District from expressing themselves upon this proposition, and when the roll was called in the Senate the junior Senator from Alabama voted of record to exclude the women of this District from passing upon this proposition.

Mr. President, I do not question the devotion of the friends of this substitute to the principle of the right of the people to rule; but I say that the argument coming from them upon this proposition is very greatly weakened by the fact that they are not willing to let the people even of the District rule.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish in a word to express my hearty approval of the original bill—the bill of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]—as it has been amended in Committee of the Whole, and to express my opposition to the so-called referendum amendment.

I see no valid reason whatever for the adoption of this amendment. Under the power given by the Constitution, Congress has legislated in matters in which the people of the District of Columbia are most vitally interested. All matters relating to schools and education, all matters relating to taxation, have been legislated upon by Congress without any intervention or without any reference of the question, however vital and important, to to the people of the District. Further than that, Mr. President, Congress has legislated again and again in the making and creating of police regulations for the District of Columbia. It has limited the number of saloons; it has imposed licenses upon the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia. How came Congress, may I ask, so to legislate, so to enact this restrictive legislation, except that the sentiment of the people not only of the District of Columbia but of the United States demanded such regulatory legislation? And now, Mr. President, when we enact this bill in its original form, or as amended in Committee of the Whole and without the referendum amendment, considering the condition of the times, considering the growing sentiment in favor of prohibition throughout the United States, we are again, just as in the restrictive legislation we have heretofore adopted, following the growing sentiment of the people of the United States in favor of the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

Mr. President, when I look at the map and see that vast extent of dry or prohibition territory, and then think of this, as the National Capital, tolerating this the saloon evil, my inference is that Congress can not evade its responsibility. It should not fail, I think, to answer to this general sentiment of the American people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I shall vote against the referendum not only for legal reasons but for equitable reasons—the broad, equitable proposition that the people of this entire Nation are interested in the Capital just as much as the people who live here, and that if there is any referendum it should be to the people of the entire Nation.

Whenever the question of taxation arises here we discover that the people of the District of Columbia are not willing to pay all the taxes for carrying on the work of the District, and rightly so. The Nation should assume some part of that burden. If the people of this Nation have nothing to do with the management and control of the affairs of the Capital, then the people of the Capital ought to pay all the taxes of the Capital. That is the equitable principle.

The legal principle has been advanced here a number of times as to the delegation of power. I only want to add to that a proposition which has not as yet been discussed, although I had hoped it might be, and it is this: Outside of these other legal questions that have been presented the delegation of this power under the referendum is clearly unconstitutional, because if anyone will sit down and read this substitute he will discover that it delegates to the people of the District the power to regulate interstate commerce. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that we might delegate the power as to purely municipal affairs, the Supreme Court of the United States has said very clearly that in any event that is the extent of the power. I wish to place in the RECORD a reference to the case of Stoutenburgh against Hennick, which has not yet been discussed, in One hundred and twenty-ninth United States, page 141, which to my mind is a clear authority on the proposition that such a bill as this is a regulation of interstate commerce, and that power can not be delegated to the District or to any other body.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question? He has sufficient time left.

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. What about the Webb-Kenyon bill, then? That has just been held to be constitutional.

Mr. KENYON. I have not time to discuss that, but that is a bill by Congress itself regulating the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was delegated to the States.

Mr. KENYON. No; not at all. It was simply withdrawing from interstate commerce the protection of liquor shipped into "dry" territory to be used in violation of the State laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. KERN. I offer an amendment to the substitute amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana offers an amendment to the substitute, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 4 of the substitute by striking out the period at the end of section 4, inserting a comma in its stead, and adding the following words:

But no person shall be appointed to act as manager, clerk, returning officer, or in any other official capacity relating to or connected with such election who is engaged, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture or sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] to the substitute of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, the so-called referendum amendment.

I favor the modern principle of the initiative and referendum in Government. I assisted in the adoption of a constitutional amendment of that kind in my State. In the recent election I opposed the adoption of an amendment extending the power because I thought it was misleading in its character and effect.

I would have had much more respect for the amendment here proposed if it were a real referendum amendment. It does not propose a referendum at all to the people of the District of Columbia. It only proposes that the people of this District may, if 25 per cent of them desire it, have a referendum upon this proposition. It certainly would have come with better grace, if it is insisted that this is a referendum, or a proposed one, that the Congress itself should say, "A referendum is hereby provided for," or "Within 30 days the District Commissioners shall call an election." That would have been a referendum submitting the amendment to the people of the District of Columbia.

I am glad the Senator from Alabama has called our attention to our constituents here in the gallery. I have looked over this assemblage and I am pleased to see them here. They seem to be well-behaved and good citizens of this District and of these United States; and so far as I am concerned, I congratulate myself that I represent them here as well as I do the people in my own State. But this amendment does not propose any referendum. It proposes nothing of the kind. It simply permits the people of this District, upon a petition of 25 per cent of them, to have a referendum or an election for this purpose if they desire it. I say it is ineffectual and comes with poor grace, and we certainly can not be said to have voted against the referendum principle here when none is proposed even in this amendment.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama for the reasons which have been given by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], to which I wholly agree, and which under the circumstances I do not think it is necessary to repeat. If that amendment prevails, I shall gladly vote for the bill. If it does not prevail, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill, not because I do not wholly approve and am earnestly in favor of the cause of temperance, but because I am unwilling to impose upon the people of the District of Columbia conditions which do not obtain in my own State.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I understand that in order to initiate this referendum only taxpayers are allowed to sign the petition; that the poor woman who bends over her washtub to make a living for her children on account of the unfortunate habits of her husband and all other nonproperty-holding citizens are denied the right to vote upon the measure which is granted to the man who is able to care for his family and himself in luxury and in comfort. It is not a fair proposition. It does not reach to the heart or the needs of the case. It is a provision seemingly slipped in to defeat the larger question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as amended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay." In view of the pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. VARDAMAN (when Mr. GORE's name was called). I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. If the Senator from Oklahoma were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LANE (when his name was called). I wish to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay." I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay." I have been unable to secure a transfer, and I am therefore compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

NOT VOTING—10.

Catron	Gore	Lane	Warren
Fletcher	Hollis	Overman
Goff	La Follette	Owen

So Mr. UNDERWOOD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer an amendment to the bill. Permit me to explain it. As I understand the substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], which has just been rejected, it provides for a referendum to the voters of the District of Columbia of the bill proposed by the Senator from Texas, and that bill prohibits the sale of whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, ale, porter, beer, cordials, hard or fermented cider, alcoholic bitters, ethyl alcohol, all malt liquors, and all other alcoholic liquors.

The amendment which I now submit is in every respect the same as the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, with the elimination of the words "wine, ale, porter, and beer." Whereas the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made the polite intimation that my interest in this legislation refers to the products of my own State, I desire to say whether it is from that environment or otherwise I am convinced that the use of light wines and beers in moderation is not harmful, and that they are of universal use in civilized communities, and add perhaps much to the joy of living and the better understanding of things. Because California produces 90 per cent of all the wine produced in the United States is not the only reason therefore why I advocate the use of light wines and beers in the District of Columbia.

I suspect from what I hear that the bill which the Senator from Texas has in charge will be passed by this Chamber; that is the general intimation; and therefore by offering this amendment if I appeal to a sufficient number of well-disposed Members of this body we may save for the general use of the people of this District wine and ale, an object I think worthy of our thoughtful consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The amendment has already been rejected. The Senator from California offered the amendment to the Underwood amendment striking out beer and light wine, and he offers this amendment with that stricken out. The Senate has already acted upon the question.

Mr. PHELAN. In my previous amendment I accepted hard or fermented cider at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire and I exclude that now. So it rests now simply on ale, wine, beer, and porter, and not hard or fermented cider—a substantial change.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I address myself to the Senator from California. I was called out when he was offering his amendment. The Senator, as I recall it, voted against the referendum. How did the Senator vote?

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from California voted for the Underwood referendum amendment with the intention, had it prevailed, of offering this as an alternative, so that the people of the District might vote either for all liquors or simply for wines and beers. Now, the referendum amendment having failed, although my vote was cast for it, I offer independently, as a new referendum, the amendment on the desk. It is not the same as my original amendment either in form or substance.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I insist on my point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from California to offer this as an amendment to the bill, being the whole Underwood amendment, with such changes as he has made in it.

Mr. PHELAN. That is correct, Mr. President. It is exactly in the same place as the Underwood amendment before it was rejected, so far as it relates to the original bill, with changes made in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from California offered this amendment, as in Committee of the Whole, to the Underwood amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. With the difference that I included hard and fermented cider, which I eliminate from the present substitute. Therefore it is a different substitute and in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand that the Senator from California offers the Underwood proposition modified to the extent of striking out two or three words?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the proposition, the Chair understands.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is evident that if that motion is entertained we will not get to a vote for a long time, if we can strike out one or two words and reintroduce the same substitute. However, I leave it to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, subject to the right of appeal by the Senator from California, will rule that the amendment is out of order, as having been offered.

Mr. PHELAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair on the question of order. I submit that what I have now submitted differs in substance from the original amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the decision of the Chair is sustained. If there is no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it be passed?

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, the Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST responded in the affirmative.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call has been begun.

Mr. HARDWICK. I beg pardon, but the Senator from Georgia addressed the Chair before the name of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] was called, and he is entitled to recognition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, did not hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. THOMPSON. That does not change the rule. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was doubtless unfortunate in not recognizing the Senator from Georgia, but the roll call having been begun the rule requires that it shall be continued.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMPSON and Mr. GRONNA. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the calling of the roll.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. VARDAMAN (when Mr. GORE's name was called). I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. If the Senator from Oklahoma were present, he would vote for the bill.

Mr. LANE (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], but on the passage of the bill I am permitted to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] is absent and that he is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the junior Senator from New Hampshire were present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 32, as follows:

CHARLES F. WINTON V. JACK AMOS.

Mr. ASHURST submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 309), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That the Court of Claims is hereby requested to report to the Senate what facts have been found in the case of Charles F. Winton et al. v. Jack Amos; what facts are still in controversy according to the contention of the parties, including all requests for finding of fact made or filed during the present term and the action of the court thereon.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. POMERENE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 310), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk, at the rate of $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, for a period of two months.

CONTROL OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday, the 15th instant, at 2 o'clock p. m., I shall address the Senate on the joint resolution No. 193 introduced by me on yesterday forbidding Federal judges to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional and providing penalties therefor. I ask that the joint resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution forbidding Federal judges to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional and providing penalties therefor.

Whereas the Constitution of the United States gives no authority to any judicial officer to declare unconstitutional an act which has been declared constitutional by a majority of the Members of the United States Senate and of the House of Representatives and by the President of the United States, who, on their several oaths, have declared the opinion in the passage of such act that it is constitutional; and

Whereas in the Constitutional Convention, in which the Constitution of the United States was framed, the motion was three times made to give to the Supreme Court, in some shit form, the right to express an opinion upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress, and was three times overwhelmingly rejected; and

Whereas such assumption of power by the Federal courts interferes with the reasonable exercise of the sovereignty of the people of the United States and diverts it from the hands of the representatives of the people in Congress assembled to a tribunal appointed for life and subject to no review and to no control by the people of the United States, and is therefore against a wise public policy; and

Whereas the declaration by any Federal court that the acts of Congress are unconstitutional constitutes an usurpation of power: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That from and after the passage of this act Federal judges are forbidden to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional.

Any Federal judge who declares any act passed by the Congress of the United States to be unconstitutional is hereby declared to be guilty of judicial usurpation and guilty of violating the constitutional requirement of "good behavior" upon which his tenure of office rests, and shall be held by such decision to have vacated his office.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to nominate a successor to fill the position vacated by such judicial officer.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes; and desiring to have a full attendance, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been asked for, the request being seconded by a sufficient number of Senators.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the matter before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to take up House bill 408, being Order of Business 49 on the calendar.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I believe that motion is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As soon as I can have order I should like to proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For what purpose does the Senator from Missouri rise? Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the roll call had been started?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It had not been. The yeas and nays were asked for, but before the Chair could say that the roll should be called, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] had addressed the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was unable to be in the Senate yesterday afternoon, but I understand there was then a motion made to take up the volunteer officers' bill after it had been supplanted by a motion to consider the immigration conference report. I also saw in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] insisted that the measure which he was advocating had equal or superior precedence to the bill which I was advocating by reason of its position on the calendar.

I have no doubt that the bill which the Senator from Montana has moved to consider now was introduced by him early, but it was not reported nor was it introduced so early as Senate bill No. 392. That bill was first introduced by me when I was a Member of the other House, and was there reported. It was at the same time introduced in the Senate before I became a Member of this body. When I did become a Member six years ago I introduced the bill here. I have received favorable consideration for it from the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs several times. It was reported favorably, placed upon the calendar in the last Congress, as I recall it, and an arrangement was made whereby it should be considered in connection with another bill, which was known as the southern claims bill. I was then less familiar with the ways of Senators than I now am, and I gladly consented to that arrangement. I was myself in favor of the southern-claims bill, and had been on the committee that had helped report a similar measure. When, however, I asked for consideration for the volunteer officers' bill my request was answered by a filibuster. I was compelled to wait until the very last day of the session, when it was known from the very nature of things the bill could not be considered by the other House.

I reintroduced the bill at the beginning of this Congress, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, stated yesterday, and that committee reported it favorably, the Senator from Oregon himself making the report. Full hearings were had upon the bill, and have been had upon it in both Houses of Congress. Full consideration has been given to it by committees. I have called it up in the Senate or have endeavored to call it up many times, and have succeeded once or twice when there was no other business of consequence pressing for consideration in the Senate. I have at all times attempted to make such arrangements as would not interfere with what might be considered the more important matters of Congress and have never asked anything more than an opportunity to get a vote upon the bill. I have been willing to accommodate this measure to the convenience of the Senate. I have had assurances from several Senators on the other side that this bill should be considered, and be considered early in this session. If it has seemed that I have attempted to delay the consideration of any other bill, it has been because it has seemed absolutely necessary of late that those tactics, which have been employed against the measure, should be legitimately used in its defense.

Personally, in spite of all of the statements that have been made—and misstatements, as it seemed to me—as to the cost of the bill and as to its provisions, I have been very anxious that the debate should go on legitimately in order that the Senate might understand what it is.

As I have said, on yesterday while I was away a motion was made to take up the bill, and a vote was prevented by opposition Senators debating it before it was laid before the Senate and by the discussion of other matters until the adjournment of the Senate last evening. So Senators can not in justice or fairness say that I have asked or that the friends of the bill have asked anything improper, unreasonable, or unbecoming in connection with the measure.

I understand that a caucus of the majority Members of this body was held last evening, and that it was determined that this bill should not be considered. I think that is unfair, and I can not imagine that the friends of the measure on the other side of the aisle are going to be coerced into stultifying themselves by assisting to prevent the consideration of a measure as wise, as it seems to me, as just, as it seems to me, as is this bill.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to move to table the motion submitted by the Senator from Montana, not that I am so much opposed to it, but because I feel that Senate bill 392 should be considered first. Although I am not in favor of it in its present form, yet I am perfectly willing that his bill shall come up for consideration, and do not offer the objections which I shall offer and the objective tactics which I shall employ because of anything in the bill itself or because the Senator proposes it. I propose, however, to use the same tactics which have been used against this bill of mine, in order that I may determine whether or not the majority of this Senate is going to be controlled by a caucus or whether a few members of the majority are going to be controlled by the caucus against what they believe to be their just duty.

Mr. President, in order that I may, in the first instance, test the sentiment of those Senators who have expressed friendship for the bill for which I ask consideration, I move to table the motion made by the Senator from Montana, and before my motion is voted upon I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I withhold the request for the present.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator from Michigan ought to withhold the motion. He has set forth some reasons in the course of his discussion why his bill ought to be taken up in preference to the one which I urge be taken up. I should think the Senator would be quite willing to give an opportunity to present the reason why the bill which I move to be taken up be taken up rather than his bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall have to proceed in my own way in reference to this matter, because it is the only course that has been left for me to follow. I therefore first suggest the absence of a quorum, pending my motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Senator from Michigan suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Brady	Husting	Oliver	Sterling

Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Gronna	McLean	Sherman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now demand the yeas and nays on my motion to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, on which he demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] moves to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and upon that he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the question to be laid on the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes. The Senator from Michigan moves to lay that motion on the table, and the question is on that motion, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. Observing his absence, I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withhold my vote, having a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is not present.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 40, as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay on the table the motion of Mr. WALSH to proceed to the consideration of House bill 408.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 408.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word or two with reference to that motion.

On yesterday, in the absence of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], after the conference report on the immigration bill had been disposed of, I moved to take up the volunteer officers' retired list bill. On that motion the Senator from Montana made some remarks, setting out the importance of the bill that he expected to take up, and which he has now moved to take up—the water-power bill. With much, if not all, of what the Senator from Montana said with reference to that bill I am in hearty accord. I think it is a very important measure, not only to the western part of the country but to all of the country. I think it ought to be disposed of in some way. I do not care to say that I am heartily in favor of the bill as it now stands; but if it can not be made better, if it is amended as I understand the committee has recommended, I shall vote for the bill, as I think I stated on the floor during the consideration of another bill. It is a very important measure and it ought to be disposed of.

I did not make the motion that I made yesterday because I was opposed to that bill or opposed to taking up the measure, and I have not voted to lay it on the table to-day because I was opposed to it; but it has seemed to me that the measure which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has been trying to get the Senate to dispose of has not been treated fairly by the Senate. I am not going to recount the action of the Senate, the different steps that have been taken, and the different votes that have been taken with reference to it. Suffice it to say that on several occasions the vote has shown that a very considerable majority of the Senate is in favor of the passage of that measure. In my judgment if the bill had not been displaced it would have been passed long since. I am satisfied that if it were continued before the Senate now for one or two days more it would be passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if he thinks that House bill 408 has been treated quite fairly?

Mr. JONES. Well, Mr. President, I do not know of any action that occurs to me now as being unfair to it.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator knows that it stands in exactly the same situation as the other bill; namely, it was at one time the unfinished business and was displaced by the Senate.

Mr. JONES. It was not displaced by filibustering tactics. It was displaced by the action of that side of the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH. It was displaced just the same as was the bill the Senator is advocating.

Mr. JONES. That is true; but it was displaced by action largely on that side of the Chamber; not by filibustering tactics at all.

Mr. WALSH. This bill has been displaced very largely by action on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. JONES. The bill to which I refer has been displaced by filibustering tactics. Yesterday when the motion was presented the whole afternoon was taken up in discussion, a great part of which was plainly designed simply to delay action upon the motion so as to prevent its coming to a vote upon yesterday.

Without taking the time of the Senate now to go into these matters—because I do not desire to delay action upon the motion of the Senator from Montana—I shall vote against taking up the bill on his motion simply for the reason that I do not think the Senate has acted fairly toward the bill that the Senator from Michigan has been trying to take up. I recognize that according to the newspaper reports, at any rate, the majority of the Chamber met in caucus last night and decided to take up the water-power bill. They have probably in a way coerced those who are in favor of this measure, and will compel them to vote against their sentiments with reference to it, and possibly in that way prevent action upon the measure favored by the Senator from Michigan. At any rate I am going to vote against the motion to take up the water-power bill now. If, however, the bill is taken up I hope it will be passed if amended in such a way that I can give it my support.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not think I am oversensitive. I recognize the right of Senators to hold an opinion upon any measure that comes before the Senate, and I never quarrel with a Senator because of his conscientious convictions on matters of legislation.

I have been led by Senators on the other side to believe that they were as anxious as I to secure a vote upon the bill which I am advocating. They have told me so unreservedly. They have said it repeatedly, and I have presented the matter to the Senate relying upon the belief that a majority of the Senate desired to consider it. I repeat that I have had all kinds of assurances to that effect. I would not have pressed the matter if I had believed that a majority of the Senate were not favorable to it. I certainly would not use dilatory tactics for the purpose of forcing Senators to vote for a measure which they otherwise would not have supported.

Now, it appears that a vote has just been taken when it was known by every friend of the volunteer officers' bill that my object in moving to table the motion of the Senator from Montana was to get consideration for the volunteer officers' bill. There could be no other reason for my moving to lay that motion on the table except to take up this other bill, as was done yesterday; but with the exception of two Senators on the other side, as I recall, no one of the Senators who has favored the bill on that side has had the courage to vote his convictions against the directions of a caucus held last night.

If that is the true situation; if Democratic Senators are not going to vote for the bill; if they do not want it pressed; if they admit their insincerity and say by their vote: "We never intended and do not now intend to vote for your bill," I do not desire to hold it before the Senate as a block to other measures. That it has not been treated fairly there is not a Senator here who will deny. The most indirect methods have been employed to defeat it. Not in the open has it been fought, but by indirection.

I am not prepared at this moment to meet the surprise which has been given me by Senators whom I had believed and trusted. If I am to take the vote just had as being the decision of certain alleged friends of the bill that they will not support it, it would seem useless for me to hold its real friends to a course which involves the stubborn opposition of other bills. I do not care to engage in a fight just for the sake of fighting. I never have done that, and I do not care to do it now. Until I have consulted with some of the other friends of the bill, I shall not feel this afternoon like interposing any dilatory tactics against the will of the Democratic caucus as expressed by the last vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 408.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. THOMAS. I withhold my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I inquire if the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WALSH. I have a general pair with that Senator. I am unable to get a transfer and accordingly withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I inquire whether the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH (after having voted in the negative). The junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], with whom I have a pair, is absent. I therefore withdraw my vote, having voted under a misapprehension.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] who is absent. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 29—as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ashurst	James	Pittman	Stone
Bankhead	Kern	Ransdell	Swanson
Beckham	Kirby	Reed	Thomas

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water-power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. I now ask for the reading of the bill for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session now for five hours and has had a rather strenuous day. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator not to press that motion.

Mr. PENROSE. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. STONE. It is not debatable, I know; but I ask the Senator to withdraw it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will withhold it for a moment, if the Senator desires.

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator that I desire to move an executive session of a very few moments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I withdraw my motion that the Senate adjourn and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 10, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 9, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, let Thy blessing descend upon us that we may be prepared to meet the duties of life as they unfold themselves in accordance with our highest conceptions of right and truth and justice; that we may thus use the powers of mind and soul with which Thou hast endowed us to the good of mankind, and enjoy the full fruition of a well rounded out life, worthy of all emulation; in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 703, the vocational education bill, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that Members may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that Members may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the vocational education bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 703, with Mr. PAGE of North Carolina in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Federal board for vocational education a sum not exceeding $200,000 annually, to be available from and after the passage of this act, for the purpose of making or cooperating in making the studies, investigations, and reports provided for in section 6 of this act, and for the purpose of paying the salaries of the officers, the assistants, and such office and other expenses as the board may deem necessary to the execution and administration of this act. The Federal board for vocational education may allot any part of said appropriation to any United States department or bureau for the purpose of making any study or investigation, or part thereof, under the provisions of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring the purpose of the authorization as carried in the last sentence of this section, deputing to the Federal board the authority to allot part of the appropriation to any bureau or department of the Government for study or investigation.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, it is necessary that the board should have a certain amount appropriated for the administration of their labors, and this was carefully considered by the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no disputing that fact. I am trying to ascertain the reason why the committee vests authority in this board to apportion some of this money to other bureaus and departments of the Government.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that one of the purposes of the Federal board was to make studies and investigations covering the entire field of vocational education, including agriculture, and in order to make those studies the question came up at once, Shall they be made through special commissions or shall they be made through the departments already created? And one object was to connect the operation of the Federal board with the departments now in existence under the control of the Cabinet departments.

Mr. MANN. As set out in section 6?

Mr. FESS. Yes; as set out in section 6; and these last four lines in section 7 were intended to make it possible for the Federal board to carry on this investigation through the respective Cabinet departments with their army of investigators already created. That is the object of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes the policy of Congress to hold the activities of the respective bureaus to the work and to the extent that Congress has appropriated. This authority as carried in this paragraph would take away the supervisory control of Congress over the activities of the various bureaus, so far as the amount the board can expend is concerned, and to that extent Congress would lose control over the activities of the respective bureaus of the Government.

In the legislative appropriation bill, for instance, we provide considerable amounts for various activities of the Bureau of Education. I assume this item has more application to the activities of the Bureau of Education than any other activity of the Government. Yet the legislation restricts, and properly restricts, their activities to the amount that the committee determined should be utilized for those respective activities, and under this authority Congress would lose control. We would vote this board some $200,000 every year, and they, without any control at all, would say, "Well, we will launch into this activity or that activity; we will have this bureau magnify itself to the extent of doubling or trebling or quadrupling its activities by extending the appropriation $25,000, $50,000, or $100,000 a year," when Congress does not intend they should go to that extent.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman says is true, I think, without a doubt; but in this particular provision the Federal board has control of the $200,000, and this law gives them the latitude, if the board wants to exercise it, to do this investigation set out in section 6 through these other departments without creating new ones, and in that way the Congress has not lost any control that it already has not delegated to this Federal board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the need of vesting in this board this broad power to allot the appropriation? Why should not Congress have the right to determine how much money should be expended by the various bureaus and divisions of those bureaus?

Mr. FESS. I think that would not do at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, from the viewpoint of the educator it would not, and that is confirmed by the Chief of the Bureau of Education; it is confirmed by the head of every bureau in every department. They do not wish to be hamstrung or limited at all by Congress. They want to have lump-sum appropriations so that they can carry on their activities without restriction whatsoever, but experience has shown that it is well for the Government that Congress should place limitations upon their activities. We can become enthusiasts in these matters, and yet it is proper for Congress to keep control of the activities of these various boards and bureaus.

Mr. FESS. The question I wanted to ask is this: There is $200,000 provided for the administration under the control of this board——

Mr. STAFFORD. Not exceeding $200,000.

Mr. FESS. Not exceeding $200,000. That $200,000 may be utilized either by direct expenditure through appointment of various investigators or by delegating whatever it sees fit in amount to some investigators already in existence. In the latter case there is no more loss of Congress's control over the fund than the former, and I can not understand why the gentleman insists upon that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because the gentleman fails to realize that when this item of appropriation is considered by the Committee on Appropriations it will not be able to determine how much money is being used for the various activities. The board will say they need so much money, and there will be no accounting whatsoever, as far as the administration of that fund is concerned, the bookkeeping end, to determine whether the money is being expended in this line or in that line.

Mr. FESS. This board has to make report to Congress once every year as to every expenditure of that $200,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, it makes a report, but we have no control over the allotment. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a bad practice to lose control of the purse strings of Congress in this way, so that we can not control the activities of the respective bureaus of the Government.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire sympathy with the general view of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. I hardly think, however, that this particular provision is subject to the criticism he makes, at least to the extent he makes it. The gentleman will notice that in the last part of section 6, at the bottom of page 9, we have these provisions made:

Such studies, investigations, and reports concerning agriculture, for the purposes of agricultural education, shall, as far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Agriculture——

Mr. MANN. "Through"?

Mr. TOWNER. "With or through." Then the next provision is—

Such studies, investigations, and reports concerning trades and industries, for the purposes of trade and industrial education, shall, so far as practicable, be made in cooperation with or through the Department of Labor—

And so on, with the other several objects that are set out in the bill.

Now, the object of those provisions was primarily for economy. I recognize the fact that the gentleman belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, upon whom a special responsibility lies. I know he is working very ably and well in the interest of economy, and that the House is indebted to him and the people of the country are indebted to him for the care with which he challenges these various items of expenditure, and it is for that very reason to obtain economy in the operation of this bill that these provisions have been made. Now, it would be utterly impossible, I will say to the gentleman, for us to specify with particularity how much could be used or should be used in this method of assisting the various departments in their particular work in so far as it may be of assistance to us. It may be that nothing will be required from this $200,000 for any one of these particular departments; in others a large part may be required. For instance, a special investigation that might be of considerable importance to the commission might not be so important to the Agricultural Department, and for that reason the commission might be willing to bear a large proportion of the expense in that particular matter. In other cases, in regard to other investigations, the department might bear a much larger part of it. So that I say the matter is very wisely left to the discretion of the commission and the department.

We have also, as is suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], tried to make it so that the Committee on Appropriations will be able to determine, or anybody will be able to determine, just what amount of money is and has been used and for what purpose it is used, because a report to Congress must be made annually as to what particular expenditures have been made, so that Congress can see whether or not they have been made wisely. It is in that view of the case the committee has acted in the premises and, I hope, wisely.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, section 6 refers to the investigations we are to make, and these last four lines refer to having it done through the department already created, and I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this time the field of investigation as set out by the President's vocational commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the statement indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

1. A study of the movement for vocational education in other countries which will, with constant reference to the similarities or differences between their conditions and our own, furnish this country with an authoritative estimate of the causes lying behind the movement, the progress and tendencies of the work, the efficiency of different types of schools and their adaptation to American conditions and needs, and the educational, social, and economic results.

2. A study of the different types of vocational schools of all kinds which are in operation in this country, interpreting their courses of study and methods of instruction, in terms of their adaptation to the aim of the school, and the conditions to which they are to be adjusted.

3. A study of the efficiency, not only of the different types of schools but of all the vocational schools of the country, as measured by the success of their students.

4. Full information each year as to the progress of vocational education in this country, bringing up to date the statistics concerning schools already established, and calling attention to changes and tendencies, while at the same time laying particular emphasis upon new schools and new experiments and devices.

5. Information concerning such things as buildings, equipment, cost of instruction, supplies, and courses and methods of instruction, which will furnish first-hand knowledge to those desiring to establish new schools.

Information for agricultural education: The Government has already done much to promote agricultural education through the Department of Agriculture. Large appropriations have been given, which the department has applied in making studies, investigations, and experiments concerning agriculture and agricultural processes, and the resulting information has not only been of use to the farmer but also to the agricultural schools in their courses of study.

Knowledge of agriculture is much more widely disseminated than knowledge of other vocational processes. On some phases of agriculture exhaustive work has been done. These studies and investigations should be continued, to furnish materials for a more scientific agriculture, and their scope should be broadened to meet the needs of a wider range of persons in farm life.

Much of the work already done has been of a highly scientific character. This work should not be neglected, but it should be supplemented by studies of the simpler processes applicable to the more common and everyday problems of the farmer.

It is highly important that, from the great mass of data at hand and from data to be collected from further studies, more direct application be made to the use of the material in giving instruction in agriculture.

Information for home economics education: Several of the Federal departments and bureaus have already made numerous valuable studies affording information useful in the development of home economics education. A large part of this study has been along the line of foods—their preparation, composition, and nutritive values; and along the line of the construction, sanitation, and equipment of the farm home.

These studies have not only been of use in the country districts, but they have been of wide value to schools and colleges for their courses of instruction in home economics. The results have been productive of so much good that the work should be enlarged and extended with a view to placing training for the maintenance and care of the home on a scientific basis. Aside from studies which directly benefit the individual home maker there is great need of larger and more detailed information regarding vocations which are based on a knowledge of home economics—callings such as those of the dietician, the institutional manager, the matron, the lunch-room or tea-room manager, the professional cook, and other similar occupations.

The problem of home economics training for the great mass of girls who spend their early years as wage earners in stores, shops, and factories is also one for serious consideration and investigation, and one that has as yet hardly been touched, although it is perhaps more important and far-reaching than any other. Especially needed are such studies as those relating to the purchase and care of clothing, the conservation of health and the maintenance of efficiency through proper food and exercise, the planning of personal and household budgets, the proper sanitation and ventilation of home and workroom surroundings. Such studies as these and many others will be greatly needed in the development of part-time education for girls who are already at work, and would also be highly valuable in developing courses in home economics for young housekeepers who have not had the opportunity for such training in our schools.

While approving of every possible means of extending the more scientific studies and research for the development of home economics, the commission feels that the particular need at the present time is for material which will reach down to the average girl, who goes neither to high school nor to college, but upon whose training for the care of a home and family the future welfare of society will largely depend.

Information for commercial education: What has been said before of the need of wider knowledge for agriculture and for industries is equally true in general as to commerce for the purposes of commercial education. Among the many questions concerning which the country should have information for use in the training of commercial workers the following have been suggested:

Supply and demand for trained commercial workers.

Distribution of commercial workers.

Selection and placement of commercial workers.

Descriptive analysis of the world of commercial pursuits in the broad lines of employment, such as banking, accounting, business management, executive service, salesmanship, and ordinary clerical work.

Descriptive analysis of each one of these lines of employment into specific occupations and of each occupation into such important factors as source of supply of commercial workers, prevailing salaries, demands upon the worker as to general and commercial education, opportunities offered for training for higher responsibility, next position in regular order, how far previous experience prepares for the next position, the additional school training necessary as proper preparation for advancement.

The changing conditions of commerce, which bring changing requirements upon the commercial workers in any line of commercial employment.

The requirements upon commercial workers in dealing with foreign commerce.

The number and classes of foreign commercial schools of different types.

Information for trade and industrial education: We now furnish a large amount of information to aid the farmer in meeting his problems. It is just as necessary that the Government should supply knowledge for the better preparation of human labor in industry as that it should furnish information concerning soil fertility, fertilizers, pests, insects, and the best methods of farm organization for the farmer.

There is a great and pressing need for an analysis of our industries as the first step in forwarding an intelligent program for the training of industrial workers. We need an intensive study of the requirements upon wage earners in the specific occupations into which each industry is divided. Not until this is done will it be possible to know in an accurate and comprehensive way the particular kinds of training which any group of workers should have or how that training can best be given.

Among other helps for industrial education we need such things as the following:

To analyze the industries into their branches or occupations.

To ascertain what the worker in each of these occupations needs in skill and knowledge.

To learn how far this skill and knowledge can be obtained in regular work in the occupation.

To know what use is made of apprenticeship, cooperative, and trade agreement plans for the training of workers in any industry.

To know what the industry fails to give in the way of skill and knowledge that the worker needs for thorough efficiency.

To learn what the school can do in this connection.

To make careful reports from time to time, showing the progress, present conditions, problems, and tendencies throughout the country of the movement for industrial education.

To secure timely knowledge of pronounced changes in industrial processes, materials, and organizations, which affect the proper education of workers to meet trade requirements.

There are many other questions that should be answered, of which the following are examples:

What is the preferred age for beginners in any given industry in this country?

What are the upper and lower limits as to the age of the efficient worker in any given occupation?

What are the upper and lower limits as to the wage received?

What are the sources of supply for workers in a given occupation?

What are the physical requirements upon the worker in a given occupation, such as strength, endurance, quickness, deftness, fineness of sight, accuracy?

How long does it usually take to train a worker for a given occupation?

What are the occupations within an industry to which a worker may advance?

How far does the work of his present occupation prepare the worker to meet the requirements of the new one?

What is the supply and demand for workers in the various industries and occupations?

In which industries and occupations is there the greatest opportunity at the present, or any given time, for desirable employment?

Only with such knowledge will it be possible to place industrial education in this country upon an intelligent basis. Only when we have learned these things will we be able to standardize the requirements for teachers, develop proper courses of study and correct methods of teaching, and measure the efficiency of the schools in terms of what their students are able to achieve. Some agency able to cope with the problem must assist the States in this task.

The need is as great for information concerning trade and industry for use in preparing workers to manufacture goods as it is for information concerning agriculture for use in the training of farmers. The high degree of specialization in industry, the complex character of both our manufacturing processes and industrial organization, and the rapid and pronounced changes in our manufacturing life make the need for such a survey particularly urgent. In a nation-wide attempt to educate our wage earners such intensive surveys of all kinds of occupations present a field for national service by Government agencies as large and important as it is indispensable and difficult.

It is not possible to rely upon individual employers for the information necessary for a program of industrial education national in its scope. Individual employers have had little or no experience in dealing with such problems in the large, and they would, of course, be inclined to look at it only from the standpoint of their own limited interest and outlook. Furthermore, to attempt the work in this way would result only in a piecemeal job. Each manufacturer would naturally find out things which might be of general use, but would employ them only for his own benefit. This would obviously result in a large duplication of effort. Even if the investigations of individual manufacturers were well made, there would be no opportunity for comparing results. Furthermore, there could not be the widespread publicity necessary to make such results available to everybody having the same questions to face.

Neither could the task be adequately accomplished through national organizations of employers. Such organizations have had little, if any, experience in doing this work. There are, comparatively speaking, few great national organizations of employers which are equipped to undertake such a task. The present interests of such organizations would not induce them to take the time or money necessary. There are, moreover, certain grave differences between employers and employees regarding certain matters in industrial training, and these differences might easily prove a handicap to either national labor organizations or national associations of employers if either attempted to handle this matter.

This method of getting information through special interests would require a long time, even if it could be successfully accomplished in the end. It would mean piecemeal and irregular studies with disconnected results and the absence not only of a country-wide and unbiased point of view and method of approach but also of the publicity which would be of the greatest benefit to all concerned.

The States can not deal individually with this matter: No State is adequately equipped to handle it; no State has had any considerable experience, at least, with this kind of investigation; no State has even made a beginning in such work, nor could any State possibly have the necessary nation-wide point of view. Furthermore, a study of this kind by the States acting separately would be open to practically all the objections given above.

The work must be done by the National Government. The training of our workers is a national question. It requires a national outlook to approach it properly. The National Government is the one unbiased agency for the task, and the only one capable of making comprehensive studies which will be useful everywhere. Both States and individuals would have confidence in the work performed and the information disseminated by the Federal Government.

National grants for vocational schools create a greater need of assistance from Federal agencies in securing information for use in these schools. If the States should support unaided their own vocational schools this service by the Federal Government would be valuable, but with Federal grants for these schools the argument for larger Federal investments in expert information and advice has added force.

Vocational schools and classes will be successful in proportion as their organization, courses of study, and methods of instruction meet continuously the changing needs and conditions of the vocations for which they give preparation. If the schools are to fit properly for vocations, all those in charge of them must have an opportunity to secure such progressive knowledge, and this can best be furnished through a Federal agency that will give such studies a nation-wide point of view.

Should the Government establish a partnership or contract of any kind with the States for the benefit of any kind of vocational education, every consideration requires that the moneys expended in the venture should be accompanied by all the helpful knowledge which the Federal Government has gleaned or can glean from its studies. In order that every wage earner may be made an "all-round workman," the training which he receives either at the State or National expense should endeavor to prepare him as far as possible to meet successfully the varied demands of his occupation as it is practiced throughout the country. This requires an interchange of trade information such as only a Federal agency can give.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That in order to receive the benefits of the appropriation for the salaries of teachers of trade, home economics, and industrial subjects the State board of any State shall provide in its plan for trade, home economics, and industrial education that such education shall be given in schools or classes under public supervision or control; that the controlling purpose of such education shall be to fit for useful employment; that such education shall be of less than college grade and shall be designed to meet the needs of persons over 14 years of age or who are preparing for a trade or industrial pursuit or who have entered upon the work of a trade or industrial pursuit that the State or local community, or both, shall provide the necessary plant and equipment determined upon by the State board, with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education, as the minimum requirement in such State for education for any given trade or industrial pursuit; that the total amount expended for the maintenance of such education in any school or class receiving the benefit of such appropriation shall be not less annually than the amount fixed by the State board, with the approval of the Federal board, as the minimum for such schools or classes in the State; that such schools or classes giving instruction to persons who have not entered upon employment shall require that at least half of the time of such instruction be given to practical work on a useful or productive basis, such instruction to extend over not less than 9 months per year and not less than 30 hours per week; that at least one-third of the sum appropriated to any State for the salaries of teachers of trade, home economics, and industrial subjects shall, if expended, be applied to part-time schools or classes for workers over 14 years of age who have entered upon employment, and such subjects in a part-time school or class may mean any subject given to enlarge the civic or vocational intelligence of such workers over 14 and less than 18 years of age; that such part-time schools or classes shall provide for not less than 144 hours of classroom instruction per year; that evening industrial schools shall fix the age of 16 years as a minimum entrance requirement and shall confine instruction to that which is supplemental to the daily employment; that the teachers of any trade or industrial subject in any State shall have at least the minimum qualifications for teachers of such subject determined upon for such State by the State board, with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education: Provided, That for cities and towns of less than 25,000 population, according to the last preceding United States census, the State board, with the approval of the Federal board of vocational education, may modify the conditions as to the length of course and hours of instruction per week for schools and classes giving instruction to those who have not entered upon employment in order to meet the particular needs of such cities and towns.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, lines 3, 4, and 5, after the word "requirement," insert a comma and strike out the words "and shall confine instruction to that which is supplemental to the daily employment."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am hopeful that the committee may accept this amendment. The propriety of it was brought to my attention by a Member of the House who is engaged on committee work this morning. The amendment proposes to strike out the limitation as to night classes, requiring that the instruction shall be confined to that which is supplemental to daily employment. If there is one thing that a boy is to be commended for it is that having labored during the day he takes advantage of such educational facilities as may be afforded him at night.

Now, it may be that some boy who desires to obtain a vocational training may be obliged to labor very industriously during the daytime at some occupation which he desires to equip himself in by his studies in the evening, and if there be such a boy he probably would be the most deserving of all boys seeking an education. He would be of that type which we commonly regard as self-made in that he would be earning his own livelihood during the day for the purpose of maintaining himself and others, possibly, with a view of taking up some special line of instruction in the evening. It may be that such a boy seeking to learn the vocation of a metallurgist or of a machinery worker might be employed in an entirely different vocation during the day, and if the training here provided for is to be confined to the instruction that is carried on in the daytime this deserving boy may be thrown out altogether.

I leave it up to the experts of the committee who have studied this question. It presents to me one of the real humanitarian features of this bill. If we want to encourage anybody on earth to learn a useful occupation we want to encourage that boy who is striving as hard as he can all day long to take care of himself and those who may be dependent upon him, and who yet in the evening may not want to be confined to the particular line of education he has been acquiring, of necessity, during the day.

I am raising the question. The committee may have some explanation that may be satisfactory, but it has seemed to me, as it seemed to the Member who brought the matter to my attention, that by placing this limitation upon the night-school service you may be wiping out the lifelong ambition of a boy who is perhaps the most deserving of any who would apply for this kind of education.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the observation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is not only an appealing observation to most Members of the House but would seem on its face to be a justifiable amendment that ought to be made. But I hope the membership of the House will see the real meaning of it and not allow their desire to help the boy who is on the street and who wants to get out of that work into something else, to aid him to get into this particular sort of school, however laudable that desire is.

There are two classes of evening schools now in nearly all of our big cities. One is the evening preparatory school to enter some avenue of activity or some industry; that is, to prepare to get into something different from what he now is engaged in. Nearly all the cities of the country have the evening school for that purpose now existing. Then there is another evening school that is more prominent than that one, and that is where the adult has gone into work and has reached the age now beyond the school age, where he can not go to school, except to the evening school, and who had gone into work before he had a general education. He sees the need of having a general education now since he has gone out into the active world to work, and he wants to go where he can study, not the thing he is working at but the subjects of general education in order to enlarge his fund of information and increase his cultural qualities. That school, of course, is not the preparatory school that I spoke of before. The two are clearly defined, discriminated easily, and every city has both of them, as a rule.

Now, this provision is that the Federal money to be applied to evening schools shall be applied to the evening extension school, to extend the work of the boy who is now at work. It is strictly vocational. It is not to be applied to some one who is wanting to get out of the work he is doing into some other field. If it is preparatory, that school now exists, supported by the city. It is not to study something of a general cultural value that is not connected at all with his work. That is already provided in the city. But it is to simply enlarge upon his ability to do the work he is now doing. If you spread this out to include the preparatory school and also the cultural school, you are going to dissipate the fund in the evening extension school until it will be of no particular value at all.

Then, another consideration in the discussion of this subject before the President's commission was this: The evening school is now very prominent. It will not be in the years to come. The evening school is going to grow less from day to day, because our compulsory system of education is going to enlarge the day school and make less the importance of the evening school; and it will not be, in my judgment, 20 years until the evening school will be largely a thing of the past, while the continuation school will grow more prominent and important. And that is another reason the commission confines its work to the extension school in the evening rather than the preparatory school.

Mr. REILLY. The gentleman does not claim that his vocational school is going to be a cultural school, does he?

Mr. FESS. He is aiming to avoid that.

Mr. REILLY. How would the boy who has some line of work in the daytime, who does not like the work he might take in school, going to take up cultural work if he goes to your vocational school in the evening?

Mr. FESS. The vocational school in the evening that is provided by this bill is purely a vocational school, but the school that is preparatory may be cultural or may be both vocational and general.

Mr. REILLY. Very true, then. How will the boy who comes from the street pursue a general course in any vocational school that you object to?

Mr. FESS. There will be vocational courses in the evening school in the city. My objection to this is that it should be confined to the extension school and not to the preparatory school, as my friend from Pennsylvania wants, or to the other school that I mentioned, but which he did not mention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As I regard this as one of the most important features of the bill I would like to ask the gentleman one or two questions. If we consider this bill without regard to terms as to preparatory or extension courses, where is the boy on the street, who is striving the best he knows how to be an honorable boy and to make a decent living, to get his vocational education under this system?

Mr. FESS. He will get it where he gets it now, at the evening school.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but if he is not pursuing the same line of study in the daytime——

Mr. FESS. He is not excluded now from the evening school.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the bill as it reads now does exclude him.

Mr. FESS. This bill confines it; but the evening schools now existing will admit him. This bill will not preclude those schools.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman means the existing schools, aside from this bill?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to see this—which is a general vocational education bill—bar out any boy in the city or in the country, whether there happens to be a school in his vicinity at the present time or not. He certainly is as much entitled to the benefits of this bill as the boy who lives some place where there is no vocational school.

Mr. FESS. The only difference is this: Why should we widen the scope of the evening school under this provision so as to let anybody come into it, whether he is extending the work he is now doing or taking something that he is not now working at? That is the point.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want this law made general, so as to help the boy who is deserving and who is doing the best he can in the daytime against untoward circumstances of living—I want that boy to have an equal chance with any other boy to take advantage of this bill. But I observe—and I fear that what the gentleman has already explained rather justifies the thought—that, apart from what we have been discussing, there is provision here which limits certain privileges to towns of 25,000 population.

Mr. FESS. No; towns of less than 25,000 population are not covered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the theory?

Mr. FESS. The theory is that the difference in the towns would be so wide that the general law will not cover them. We leave it to the State board to make one rule for one town and another rule for another town, always by the approval of the Federal board.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, a town exceeding 25,000 inhabitants which pays for itself is to get nothing and we are to give it all to towns of less than 25,000 inhabitants.

Mr. FESS. Oh, you are talking about evening schools?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I am talking about the evening schools provided in this bill.

Mr. FESS. This proviso does not cover the evening school. This covers the general bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; beginning on line 2 of page 16 the language is:

> That evening industrial schools shall fix the age of 16 years as the minimum entrance requirement and shall confine instruction to that which is supplemental to the daily employment.

Now, I am trying to strike out——

Mr. FESS. That is daily employment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am trying to strike out that limitation as to the boy or girl attending the evening school. But, as I understand the gentleman now, he thinks the provision ought to remain in, because perchance it may be that in the city of New York they already have industrial schools and night schools.

Mr. FESS. They do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And therefore the Government ought not to extend its general educational system to the city of New York, although it pays part of the taxes. That does not seem fair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FESS. Gladly.

Mr. MANN. To see if I understand the theory of this bill. It is not expected, as I understand, that the money appropriated in this bill is to furnish education for all people who may desire it, but within the limits provided in the bill to endeavor to furnish vocational education?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And not intending to furnish, out of the provisions of this bill, education to everybody, it is proposed to confine it to vocational education, and in doing that to give assistance to those who are now in some vocation?

Mr. FESS. That is the whole purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more, to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. The bill provides for three kinds of schools—the all-day school, the part-time school, and the evening school. The all-day school requires a limitation in age. The pupil must not be less than 14 years of age. The evening school makes the limitation 16 years. In the all-day school there is a provision that the work shall be extension work, one-half of the time be spent in the classroom and one-half in the shop or field. The part-time school is where the individual has gone to work for pay, and the limitation in time, in hours of recitation, is fixed by law 144 hours per year. In the evening school, however, we do not limit the time, but we say that the limitation must be confined to those who are studying in the evening the industry that they are working at during the day. I do not believe that it would be wise to take the fund out of the three types, to disseminate it without limitation in the evening school that is not going to be continuous. Anyone can see that the evening school is going to lessen from year to year if the all-day and part-time schools will be inaugurated. It will not do to dissipate this fund, to extend to all classes who might want to go into the evening school, and thus popularize the evening school at the expense of the part-time and all-day schools. I sincerely hope that the fund will not be thus dissipated, but will be confined to the extension work in the evening school while the evening school lasts.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all discussion on this section and amendments thereto conclude in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all discussion on this section and amendments thereto conclude in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The explanation of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that there are three grades of schools does not, as I see the situation, change it at all, as all three schools are vocational schools.

Mr. FESS. They can not utilize this fund unless they are.

Mr. REILLY. Then all of these vocational schools should be open to every boy in the community, of the proper age who desires to attend them, regardless as to whether or not the boy desires to receive instructions along the lines of his daily employment; at least discretionary power should be left with the local authorities to permit such boy to attend one of these vocational schools.

Night schools are not at the present time established in all parts of the country. They are comparatively new institutions and besides they provide for a general education and not for vocational instruction.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. REILLY. The gentleman from Texas will kindly excuse me; my time is limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. REILLY. It would seem that if a boy who is engaged during the daytime, not in walking the streets, but in a line of work which he is obliged to follow for want of a job to his liking, should not be debarred from the opportunity to attend a vocational night school located in his home town simply because he desires vocational training to qualify him for a line of industrial work other than he is engaged in at that time, but that he intends to take up as the means of making a living.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. This is precisely what this bill is trying to prevent. If the boy is educated to be a farmer, and wants to be a better farmer, he would not go to the school in order to get out of farming into something else. We want his skill and efficiency to be applied to the thing which he is doing. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. REILLY. Does the gentleman maintain that a boy who wants to quit the farm should be kept on the farm and denied an opportunity to get vocational training along some other line?

Mr. FESS. Not at all, but if he is going to quit he should not get the provisions of this bill that pertain to the farm.

Mr. REILLY. If a boy wants to quit the farm, he should be given an opportunity to take up some other line of vocational education, and the mere fact that he is a boy from the farm should not debar him from attending a vocational night school to get training in some industrial line.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that in the gentleman's State boys who come up from the farm to the university, intending after their education to go back to the farm, go into cultural work—the professions—at least a large percentage of them, and never return to the farm? This is the thing we are trying to avoid.

Mr. REILLY. My observation is that only a very few boys have entered the University of Wisconsin with the intention of returning to the farm again. There are a few cases where boys have entered the agricultural college, and later switched their course from the special line of agriculture to a general college course.

Mr. FESS. That is what I mean.

Mr. REILLY. But assuming these facts to be true, that does not justify shutting the door of a vocational school to any boy in the community who desires to secure vocational training, no matter in what line, or no matter whether the boy is from the farm or the city.

Mr. FESS. We do not close the door, but we say to him, "If you want this particular training, you can get it in this school, but if you want some other training, not supplemental to your work, go to some other school to get it."

Mr. REILLY. But the other school is not a vocational school. There is no use trying to drive boys back to the farm or keep them there against their will. The boy who works on the farm in the daytime and is looking forward to a career as a mechanic should be permitted to attend an evening vocational school to prepare himself for the line of work that he intends to follow.

I am very much in favor of the pending measure and I hope that it will become a law before the present session of Congress adjourns, thereby adding one more constructive piece of legislation to the long and creditable record of the present administration.

Many of the leading educators of to-day, men and women who have given deep thought and study to the educational problem, are convinced that our present educational system is top-heavy, that it does not offer sufficient facilities for the efficient education of the great mass of boys and girls of to-day who will be men and women of to-morrow.

Under the existing educational conditions in this country, too much time and money is devoted to the higher education of the few and too little time and money to the education in the practical ways of life of the many. In round numbers there are 30,000,000 children in this country between the ages of 6 and 20 years, inclusive, of which number about 50 per cent reside in the country and 50 per cent in our cities and villages.

It is stated that 85 per cent of the children of the country leave school before they reach 16 years of age; that not over 8 per cent of the school boys and girls ever go through high school; and that only about 3 per cent of those who graduate from high school go on to the higher schools and colleges. More than a million of the boys and girls of our country are added each year to the army of industrial and agricultural workers of the land, most of them without any practical training designed to make successful and efficient breadwinners.

There can be no doubt at all but that our present educational system is not meeting the real needs and requirements of this day and age as far as the practical preparation for life's battle of the industrial and agricultural doers upon whom our future as a Nation largely depends.

Our educational system to-day is too theoretical, not enough practical; too extensive, not enough intensive. The training that the large majority of the boys and girls receive is not of the character to prepare them for the practical work of life.

Unfortunately, our educational system has been hampered by so-called educational fads. Every little while some ambitious mortal desiring to reform the world offers a new educational theory which is guaranteed to be a panacea for all human ills and the result is the curriculum of the lower grades has become crowded with a lot of new-fangled, half-baited educational ideas, none of them bearing upon the practical education of the child.

If part of the money being spent to-day in our higher educational institutions could be diverted to the work of training our future citizens, the 85 per cent that never go beyond the high school, much better results would be obtained from the enormous expenditures, over $600,000,000, in this country every year for educational purposes.

Friends of the vocational educational movement believe that something should be done in the way of training vocationally the 85 per cent of our school population who under the present conditions are turned out into the world to begin life's battle handicapped for want of knowledge of how to do, and they hope that this bill when it becomes a law will mark the beginning of an educational movement in this country that will make it possible for every boy and girl to go out into the world equipped with practical training for life's work.

This bill provides for three lines of vocational education—agricultural, trades and industry, and home economics.

The initial appropriation on the part of the National Government for the first year of the operation of this bill is only $1,500,000, but the appropriation is to be increased annually until at the end of the tenth year the annual contribution of the National Government will be $7,000,000 a year. In order to secure such appropriations from the National Government, the various State governments are required to put up at least an equal amount, so that at the end of the 10 years, if all the States of the Union take advantage of the national aid provided for in this bill, there will be expended annually in this country at least $14,000,000 a year in the upbuilding and maintenance of a vocational educational system.

When the full limit of the national appropriation at the end of 10 years is reached, $3,000,000 of said appropriation is to be devoted to agricultural vocational training, to be apportioned to the States in the proportion that the agricultural population of the various States holds to the agricultural population of the Nation; $3,000,000 to vocational training in trades, industries, and home economics, the apportionment being based on the ratio that the industrial and trade population of the various States holds to the industrial and trades population of the Nation, all of said sum to be used in paying part of the salaries of the teachers in these three lines of vocational education; and $1,000,000 to be devoted to the training of teachers in the three fields of agriculture, trade and industry, and home economics, making in all a total sum of Federal aid of $7,000,000, which will be of the national appropriation for the year 1927 and thereafter.

It is to be hoped that this measure will fully meet the expectations of its friends and well-wishers; that it will mark the beginning of larger expenditures in this country for the practical preparation for life of our future citizens.

Our country is far behind other countries in the world in the important work of preparing our youths to become efficient workers in agriculture and industry.

Germany has long been a leader in the practical education of her youths. Much of Germany's efficiency is due to the fact that education in Germany is more practical and less theoretical than in other countries.

The Kingdom of Bavaria, a territory having a population about the size of New York, has more trade schools than there are to be found in all the States in this Union. It has been said that there are more economic workers being trained at public expense to-day in the city of Munich than in all the cities of the United States. The aim of the German educational system is to prepare Germany's citizens not theoretically but practically, through her great vocational educational system, to become efficient workers in whatever field of activity they may adopt as their life's work.

A country is great when the masses of its citizens are contented and happy. There can be no contentment and happiness among our industrial and agricultural workers unless there is efficiency, and if we are going to produce in this country an army of efficient workers in all fields of human activity, the cultural side of education, so long emphasized in this country, must claim less attention of the time and revenues of the Government, in order that the more practical education in the training of how to do may receive its due emphasis.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the more the gentleman from Ohio explains this proposition the more I am inclined to believe the amendment is right. I sympathize with him in his suggestion that we ought to keep the boy on the farm by educating him to be a farmer, and that there are large inducements for the boy who started on the farm to leave the farm and go into the city; but the gentleman entirely overlooks the great industrial situation, and I regret to say that there are very few spokesmen here who take up that side of the educational question. It may not be known to the gentleman from Ohio, or to the majority of this House, but the industrial trades to-day, particularly the building trades, are sorely in need of skilled mechanics, the supply of whom is growing less and less day by day. It may be due to certain labor conditions which I do not care to discuss at this time, but the fact is that in a great city like Philadelphia we do not have the men skilled in the building trade to keep up with the demand for them. Now, granted that you are endeavoring to keep the boy on the farm—which I approve—what about that boy in the city with the widowed mother, weak and sickly, and who is her sole support? Through the aid of friends she obtains for him a position as a boy tending a door in a broker's office. Is that the business that he is to follow at night when he takes advantage of this vocational education bill to secure an education? Or he becomes an errand boy in a law office. Is that what you want him to learn, when we are seeking boys at high wages to follow industrial lines? Suppose he becomes a "washer-out" in a beer saloon. Is that the business in which you desire to have him taught, and is that the vocation you wish him to follow in the study that he takes up at night? What is to become of this boy who is not a farmer's boy, but who is just as worthy of consideration, or who may become just as dangerous a member of the community as any man against whom you now inveigh, if when he knocks at the door for an opportunity to learn at night, to be a bricklayer or to be a tinsmith, or a carpenter, you say, "No." Because he is earning a few dollars per week in a bank, because he is running errands, because he is an office boy, or because he works in a factory, therefore in order to obtain the advantages of this vocational education bill, must he follow the errand-boy trade at night? Must he study being a doorkeeper's boy at night, or must he study the ticker at night in order to be admitted to these night schools?

Gentlemen, I hope you will give this matter serious consideration, and bear in mind that while the purpose to keep the farmer's boy on the farm may be commendable, and I believe it is, you must not bar from an honorable and honest education the boys in the city who will have no place to go except the street after their day's work is done if you refuse them admission to this national-school advantage, provided for by the money of all the people of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I believe this bill is one of the most important measures which will come before Congress. Every business man outside, perhaps, of the professions, is aware that the trend of the young men to-day is away from vocations of the hand and favoring the vocations of the brain. I contend that both are necessary and that both should be more or less attained by every student, especially those who will be compelled sooner or later to look to their own industry for support. There are innumerable instances all over the country where the services of young men are needed for mechanical and other positions of trust at excellent remuneration which it is hardly possible to fill. An advertisement in a paper for a person to fill a clerical position at $15 a week will bring a sheaf of answers, but an advertisement for a young, intelligent man to learn a trade and develop executive ability along this line remains unanswered in many instances. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I favor this measure and I hope it will be enacted into law. Nothing will more benefit the country at large than the stimulation and direction of the ideas of the young to broaden their field of endeavor and to realize that mechanical and business development is as valuable if not more valuable than the development merely of their mental powers along professional lines. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be unfortunate if the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] should be adopted. I want to illustrate from a little personal experience. I left home when I was 10 years old. I went to work. The first job I had was carrying water to a lot of men. I got 50 cents a day. I had no education, of course. I found as I went along in the effort to learn a trade, which would eventually enable me to embark in business, that I would have to have some education. I knew that I would not have time to get a general education and so I conceived the thought that it would be wise to go to school at night, notwithstanding the fact that I worked hard all day. When I went to school at night I determined that I would learn things that had to do with the business on which I embarked. I did the things that would make me more proficient in business, make me more valuable to the man who employed me, and more valuable to myself. It soon occurred to me that I was going to learn the business and remain in it for a livelihood. I knew the line of work I would have to do, and so I concluded the kind of education I must have. I learned mechanical drawing, as well as the things that had to do with the work I was called upon to do. I learned to be a draftsman, and then I learned engineering, and learned just exactly the things that applied to the work that I was engaged in, and the things that would render me fit to take hold of the technical things connected with the business. Out of the small compensation I received from time to time I paid for the little education I was able to obtain. The result was that because of the training connected with the work I was enabled to do things that other boys were unable to do, and the result was that when opportunity for promotion came I had the opportunity given to me. And so it was I was able to succeed.

Now, I believe that if you are going to use the night schools for training, that training ought to be along the work which the pupils who attend them are engaged. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is adopted it will cut out the very things which this bill provides. I hope, basing my statement on my own experience, that this bill if enacted, as I hope it will be, will contain the provision in lines 3, 4, and 5, page 16, the language of which I quote—and shall confine instruction to that which is supplemental to the daily employment.

Nothing could be more important, in my judgment, than training the mind of the boy that is willing to go to school at night along the line that he is employed in during the day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has made a success in life, and it constitutes a very interesting chapter in the lives of Members of Congress. The gentleman states that he began by carrying water. Of course, that was not the occupation he studied at the night school. I ask the gentleman if he had begun by being an errand boy in an office, or by washing out a saloon, whether he would like to have been obliged to follow studies on similar lines at night?

Mr. MADDEN. Fortunately the educational institutions of the United States do not to-day provide for education in the best methods of operating a saloon [applause], and it might be also fortunate if less schools provided a better method of training many lawyers. If we put them into useful employment, where they would develop the wealth of the country, instead of befogging the conditions after the wealth is developed, we would have better conditions in the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. Does the gentleman want to deny the education to these boys which they prefer?

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry that I can not agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin. In my reading of the clause in this bill it leads me unalterably to the conclusion because of the course I adopted for myself when I had the privilege of making the selection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Suppose a young man, very poor, goes to work in a telegraph office and learns telegraphy, but he has a greater ambition and would like to get into something better than that, does the gentleman think it would be right to compel that young man to go to this institution and study telegraphy?

Mr. MADDEN. One word in reply to the gentleman. I recall one fact: That Will Gardner lived in the little town of Lamont, Ill., where I was brought up. He was a telegraph operator at a side station. He afterwards became secretary to the president of the Northwestern Railroad, and later became president of that road. The present president of the Chicago & Milwaukee Road was an obscure operator. He is now president of the St. Paul and a genius in his line. I pay a man that I picked up as a telegraph operator in a freight yard $15,000 a year now because he had the genius, and the fact that a man is a telegraph operator does not prevent him from becoming a great man. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very important proposition. The natural sympathy is on one side, but it seems to me that common sense is on the other side. In the United States there are hundreds of millions of dollars every year expended for education, not out of the Federal Treasury but from the local treasuries. We are proposing now to expend a very small amount of money, as compared with the total, for the purpose of vocational education. It is not designed to pay out of the General Treasury money for the education of boys whether they have ambition or not. That is not the purpose of this bill. We are not undertaking to give an education out of the General Treasury to all of the boys and girls in the country, but the purpose of this bill is to give boys a vocational education. If you undertake to spread it all around, you will not give anybody a vocational education.

Now, the first thing to do is to give the boy a supplementary education; that is where you get the most benefit for the boy who does the work, whether on the farm or in the shop. Any boy in the city or on the farm in the country can get a supplementary education at night which will be of great value to him. You want to encourage these boys to go into the night school and study in reference to the work that they are doing in the expectation that you will make them permanent in their particular line of work. This bill is not for the purpose of aiding boys through ambition to change their occupation, but to give to the carpenter who is busy with his work as apprentice in the daytime supplementary education at night, to give the boy in the machine shop supplementary education at night, and if you undertake to give to everyone education at night, you will not give anybody the education he ought to have. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 8, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return for a moment to section 10 of the bill, for the purpose of getting some information?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to return to section 10 for the purpose of getting some information as to the view of the chairman of the effect of lines 8, 9, and 10 upon a certain class of agricultural schools we have in the State of Michigan. On page 14, in lines 8, 9, and 10, the following language occurs:

That such schools shall provide for directed or supervised practice in agriculture, either on a farm provided for by the school or other farm, for at least six months per year.

We have in our State a number of agricultural schools maintained partly by the State and partly by the district in which the school is located.

Mr. HUGHES. That is the common school, is it?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; they are agricultural schools connected with high schools. The agricultural college trains the teacher, and the State pays part of the expense. As a rule, those schools are coextensive, as to time, with the village or city school where the class is organized, and that, as a rule, is 10 months. What I would like to know is how young men who are taking those agricultural courses can get six months of supervised practice?

Mr. HUGHES. Under this vocational education bill they would go to school for a certain length of time, but it is specified they must have practical experience in the field for six months.

Mr. KELLEY. Suppose these young men, during the 10 months of the school year, give a certain portion of the time to studying soil, dairying, horticulture, and all that kind of thing, by actual practice on the farms of the surrounding neighborhood, and carry on that work systematically a certain portion of the time each week during the school year, in connection with their classes in the high school, would that be a compliance with this provision?

Mr. HUGHES. I am inclined to think that it would.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. There was some question as to whether that ought to be six months or four and a half months, making one-half of the school year of nine months, but taking into consideration the winter months that might be used for stock grading, milk testing, and seed testing, they claim there might be some of the time in the winter while the pupil is in school part of the time when he could do this practical work that is not really out in the field, but is still agricultural work, and so they decided on making it six months in the year, thinking that the practice work was more important than the theoretical.

Mr. KELLEY. If they are required to spend six months out of the nine in supervised work, that would mean that two-thirds of their time would have to be spent in the practical work in the field?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Two-thirds of the time only that they devote to agriculture.

Mr. FESS. Of course, that is the whole year.

Mr. KELLEY. I am heartily in accord with the general purpose of this provision, and yet I wanted to be sure that these young men who are studying agriculture in Michigan and are doing a certain amount of practical work in the field during the regular school year would have such time counted on these six months?

Mr. FESS. They would, and they would not need to be even working in the soil. It can be in the winter months in Michigan, where they are doing some work on the farm. This does not mean that all the time of each month, or week, or even day, must be spent on the farm. It might be a part of the day, or week, or month, throughout the year. That will satisfy the requirements of the law.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all I wanted to know.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the Federal board of vocational education shall withhold the allotment of moneys to any State whenever it shall be determined that such moneys are not being expended for the purposes and under the conditions of this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 19, after line 8, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 17. That no allotment of moneys under this act shall be made to any State which does not require of the teachers, supervisors, or directors of public education an obligation to support and defend the Constitution of the United States or which continues in employment teachers, supervisors, or directors of education who instill into the minds of their pupils theories or opinions subversive of the Constitution or the Government of the United States."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this amendment with a view of ascertaining whether the committee will accept it. The bill provides for a very large number of teachers, supervisors, and directors of education. While I am in favor of the purpose of the bill and expect to vote for it, I do not intend to let the opportunity pass to say a word about one phase of our present day civilization. We are adding very largely to the expenses of the Government in the employment of a new array of persons who will not be directly under our authority, but to whose support we contribute. Many of these persons will be in control of the education of the youth of the country and will be responsible for the quality of citizenship that develops from that youth.

I have no particular college to point out nor any particular educational institution, but it is patent to anyone who reads the newspapers of to-day, and particularly the strictures upon our form of government which occasionally emanate from some of the learned professors and teachers of the country, that we will in due course, in these educational matters, have a great problem to solve. I think I am not going far astray in saying that there are some college professors who are misleading the young with respect to the purposes and principles of the Government of the United States, very much to the shame of the great mass of educators of this country who are patriotic and well meaning and whose efforts in the direction of education are well bestowed. But the time will come, if it has not already come, when it may be advisable for members of State legislatures, as well as for Members of Congress, to say to certain men and women in control of the education of our children that the expression of their personal opinions with regard to politics, with regard to political economy, with regard to theories of government, sometimes in derogation of the Government itself, must be regulated and that they must attend to the business for which they are paid, to properly educate the youth of this country within proper lines of citizenship and patriotism.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield.

Mr. FESS. What about the feasibility of creating a board of censorship?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I take it we have had enough boards of censorship recently, but we can, if the gentleman wants it, create a new board and add to the difficulties of the present administration. But we have been advised upon political topics from school-teachers high and low, and some of the people of the country have been misled by professors of high degree. Their opinions have not always been patriotic, and the question arises whether, when we expend the public money for the purposes of public education, we should tell our employees to confine themselves to the purposes of their employment rather than to lead the children of the country into economic and political error.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. What does the gentleman think of a school-teacher who when he gets into politics changes his mind on all these matters?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think a professor who gets into politics, runs for governor or a higher office, is a man to be watched if he is still to influence the school children of the country. His opinions on questions like the tariff might change.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a serious question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is always serious, and I will endeavor to be as serious in answering him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there any more harm in a learned professor undertaking to inculcate in the minds of his pupils his own individual opinion than simply to repeat the individual opinion of some other professor who has written a textbook on the subject?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think there is danger in an individual teacher endeavoring to inculcate his individual views on public questions into the minds of children. If the gentleman wants me to proceed any further, I would say it is a very unwise proposition to take a professor from a great college who has only one opinion in regard to a great question like the tariff and put him in charge of a tariff board to control the tariff destinies of this country. It is not always best to put a one-sided, one-minded theorist in control of the tariff of the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman elucidate for the benefit of the committee some process by which any school-teacher may be able to comment on textbooks on any subject without giving expression to his personal opinion?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. "The shoemaker should stick to his last." It is on that theory this bill has been framed, in view of the amendment defeated a few moments ago. The preacher who goes into politics is entering upon dangerous ground, and I am inclined to think the school-teacher should keep out. He can not be a good school-teacher and a political partisan at one and the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the privilege of speaking for not more than five minutes. I do not think I have opened my mouth on this bill up to this time.

Mr. HUGHES. In view of the gentleman's request, I will ask that all debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] for his courtesy. I have refrained from prolonging the debate on the bill, although it is not a policy of legislation with which I am in sympathy. I am in sympathy, permit me to say—and now I suppose I am making a futile effort to have my opposition to this bill understood both in the country at large and among many of my constituents—I am in sympathy with the idea of training the young of this country in all ways of making an honest living and doing useful work for society at large. I am in favor of training them in the art of the smith, of the carpenter, and in every other direction in which their minds and hands may be made skillful for the benefit of society at large and in order that they may get an honest living for themselves and their families; but, Mr. Chairman, I can not but regard this sort of legislation as an assault upon the prerogatives and the high duties of the States. We have always believed, most of us at least, that the duty of educating the youth of the country was particularly and peculiarly that of the family and of the State, and a number of years ago, so many years ago I do not now remember with any degree of clearness or accuracy, time, and particularities, there was considered in the Congress of the United States a bill known, I believe, as the Blair bill—I ask the gentleman from Illinois if that is not what it was called? It was opposed by many distinguished people of the South as an assault on the rights of the States and by a great many eminent and distinguished people in the North as an effort to control the schools of the States by the Federal Government. Now, this is somewhat in the same line of legislation and it is, in my judgment, an assault upon the States and upon their duties and their privileges. Coupled as these assaults are with an appropriation, it is made acceptable to many palates that would otherwise reject it. I venture to make this brief speech, Mr. Chairman, because my position has not been understood by some and has been and will again be misrepresented. If you do not agree with any proposal in toto and if you do not agree with the methods with which that proposition is advanced, you are at once denounced as being opposed to such measures in their purpose. Such is the fashion of speech of the times, such the prevailing intolerance of the day.

As a matter of fact, I am just as much in favor of developing our schools in the States and by the States to the highest degree of efficiency, both in the academic and in the vocational lines, as any man can be. I have my views about how it should be done, and they do not happen to accord with the views of the author of this bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will be brief. I have only two or three minutes.

Mr. FESS. The Blair educational bill had the power with it to apply the money by the Federal authorities, but this bill does not do that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. FESS. This bill provides for the cooperation of the State, and the State does not need to receive it if it does not wish to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of course not; and if we had the frank and brutal proposition of the Blair bill, my friend from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES], a man whose character is so lovable and whose intentions are so honest that anyone who has come in contact with him must love and respect him, would have rejected it at once. But, Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that this is but the beginning. It is an insidious attack, sugar-coated, as I said a few moments ago, with an appropriation. I believe as sincerely, sir, as I believe anything in this world—and I have some faiths that I do believe in and stand by—that this is a beginning of the destruction of the State system of public schools. What is to prevent some Member in the future——

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have only five minutes allotted, and then the debate closes.

What is the ultimate purpose of some gentlemen who advocate this sort of thing? What is to prevent them from coming forward with another measure next year, advancing a little bit further toward that result and tempting us with a larger appropriation? That is how it is done, Mr. Chairman, and it will go on and people who pay an indirect tax to the Government, thus failing to appreciate the amount of their contribution to the support of an almost criminally extravagant Government, will consent to these appropriation-carrying schemes because they seem not to appreciate the fact that the same people who will pay this appropriation also pay the direct contributions to the State schools. The same people pay the bills, but instead of paying them directly and after the least expensive method this bill will compel them to follow the most expensive way.

The contribution to the States is contemptible in amount, in derogation of the dignity of the States, and hurtful to the system of public schools within the States, in that it will teach the taxpayers more and more to rely upon Federal appropriations, but it suffices to tempt gentlemen from the traditions and principles of their party, the party of Thomas Jefferson.

A distinguished Member said to me a few minutes ago that the State lines are dim now and growing dimmer. I asked him if this measure, which he supports, is not an assault on the autonomy of the States and helping to make them less and less important in our political scheme. Being an honest man, as well as a Republican, he answered frankly that it did. I invited him to make that statement to the House, which he would not do; but I beg my Democratic brethren from the South to reflect on his observations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. By unanimous consent, all debate on this section and amendments thereto is closed.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That if any portion of the moneys received by the custodian for vocational education of any State under this act, for any given purpose named in this act, shall, by any action or contingency, be diminished or lost, it shall be replaced by such State, and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation for such education shall be paid to such State. No portion of any moneys appropriated under this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of lands, or for the support of any religious or privately owned or conducted school or college.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am so much interested in this bill that I had hoped that it might be unanimously passed by this House. I have heard in private conversation a number of objections that have apparently been in the minds of some Members against this legislation. Some of them have somewhat felt that it was a "pork-barrel" proposition. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is not anything in this bill that savors of "pork." There is no provision in this bill for the erection of buildings or for the maintenance of schools in any State. The bill simply provides for Federal encouragement to a certain particular kind of education.

And not only is there no savor of "pork-barrel" legislation in this bill, but it is not sectional. Many of us opposed the Shackleford roads bill because we believed it contained an unfair discrimination in favor of certain States at the expense of other States. Under the provisions of that bill States in the North of small area and large population would be obliged to bear an undue burden of taxation for the purpose of constructing roads purely local in character in other States without any comprehensive plan for a system of roads connecting the several States that would be really national in its scope.

On the other hand this bill is absolutely fair. Half of the appropriation goes to States for agricultural education in proportion to their rural population, while an equal sum goes to the great industrial States of the North for technical education in proportion to their urban population. It is the fairest bill involving a Federal appropriation for the encouragement of State activities which are of national concern that has ever been introduced in the Congress of the United States.

Now a number of Members have raised the question of the constitutionality of this bill and I observe that my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is worried about the encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of the States. Away back at the beginning of this Government when that great Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, in his famous Report on the Public Credit recommended legislation incorporating the first bank of the United States, the same question was raised. And Mr. Madison, in charge of the bank bill, was challenged to show any power in the Constitution giving Congress the right to charter any such institution. And then and there was invoked the doctrine of implied powers. It was shown that, while there was no direct power granted to Congress in the Constitution to charter a bank and that while apparently the chartering of banking corporations was a State matter, that power could be implied from the power to borrow money; could be implied from the power to raise and support armies; and could be implied from the power to provide and maintain a Navy.

And, Mr. Chairman, in this bill the power of Congress to encourage and aid the States in agricultural and technical education can be implied plainly from those same two clauses in the Constitution, because to-day one of the greatest factors in preparedness, in raising and supporting an Army and in providing and maintaining a Navy, is the question of an adequate food supply for this country in any emergency that may arise. Moreover, one of the greatest factors in raising and supporting an Army and providing and maintaining a Navy is the existence of a sufficient number of men trained in the industrial arts, and in that particular we in this country are sorely lacking. Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a bill whose constitutionality in this critical period, when we are talking so much about national preparedness, can be maintained, it is this bill. I trust it will receive the vote of every Member of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 12 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Education, of which the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, the Hon. DUDLEY M. HUGHES, is chairman, has unanimously reported this bill to the House and recommended its passage. It provides for vocational education, and vocational education as defined in this bill refers to that kind of practical education which is designed to prepare girls and boys for useful employment and occupation. It is further designed to prepare workers for the more common occupations in which the great masses of our people find useful employment. As here used, it means that form of education whose controlling purpose is to give training of a secondary grade to persons over 14 years of age, for increased efficiency in useful employment in the trades and industries in agriculture, in commerce, and commercial pursuits, and in callings based upon a knowledge of home economics.

This proposed legislation is based upon the theory that every occupation may be so filled as to reflect intelligent guidance. It provides for the training of teachers of agricultural, trade, and industrial and home economic subjects, for the paying of part of the salaries of teachers, supervisors, and directors of agricultural subjects, and of teachers of trade and industrial subjects. The great necessity for this legislation is shown in the fact that there are 12,659,203 boys and girls in the United States engaged in agriculture, who will be directly benefited by this bill. There are also engaged in manufacturing, economic, and allied industries 14,261,376 boys and girls who will also be greatly benefited.

While vocational education has already been inaugurated in many localities, the American people have hardly begun the work of providing for the practical education of these millions of our wageworkers. In this whole country there are fewer trade schools than are to be found in the little German Kingdom of Bavaria, with a population not much greater than that of New York City. There are more workers being trained at public expense in the city of Munich alone than in all the larger cities of the United States, representing a population of more than 12,000,000. It is substantially true that practically every German citizen who could profit by it may receive vocational training for his life work in the schools and classes supported out of the public treasury, and this accounts largely for the efficiency and progress of the German people.

This bill proposes Federal aid in two spheres—first, payment of salaries of teachers of agricultural subjects and all teachers of trade and industrial subjects, and, second, preparation for training of teachers of the foregoing subjects. The importance of the training of teachers and the great necessity for it at the present time is demonstrated in the following facts in reference to the teachers in this country published by the Bureau of Education:

BETTER TEACHERS FOR THE RURAL SCHOOLS.

The rural schools of the United States are in sore need of better qualified teachers. At least one-third of the rural teachers for the country at large have no professional training. The average scholarship of this class of untrained teachers is little more than an eighth-grade education. There are 212,000 one-teacher rural schools in the United States. It is conservative, therefore, to say that there are 70,000 rural teachers in this country with only an elementary education and no professional training. There is one State in the Union that has over 4,000 teachers with only a seventh-grade education and no professional training in charge of its rural schools this year. There are several States that number their rural teachers in this class by the thousands, and there are many States that count their rural teachers in this class by the hundred.

Another third of the rural teachers of the United States have only a limited amount of professional training, and on an average their scholarship is not above the tenth grade; that is, a two-year high-school education beyond the eighth grade. There are at least 70,000 teachers in this class.

A majority of the remaining one-third of the rural teachers of our country have on the average only a four-year high-school education, which includes from one to two years' attendance at a State normal school or the professional work given in the junior and senior years in teacher-training high schools or several summer terms at summer schools for teachers.

These are the conditions that face us in the qualifications of our rural teachers. The problem that confronts us is how to improve these conditions. It is the purpose of the Bureau of Education to issue a series of talks in an effort to show the country how to solve this most important problem in American education to-day. The fact that we have over 150,000 teachers without adequate preparation for their work is enough to arouse the public mind on this question to such a degree that within the next decade we shall have a sufficient number of teachers with adequate training for every rural school in the United States.

I know nothing personally as to the correctness of these figures, but they are authentic and I presume correct, and therefore I have quoted them.

The teachers throughout the land will have an opportunity to avail themselves of the benefits of this bill, which will redound not only to their good but to the permanent and great benefit of the boys and girls whom they will have the opportunity to teach in their schools. There is no greater calling in this country, except it be the minister of the gospel, than that of the school-teacher. I believe the two most important and far-reaching affairs of life are the cultivation of the mind and the salvation of the soul. [Applause.] The teacher cultivates the mind; the minister is instrumental in securing the salvation of the soul. One scatters sunshine and happiness during the lives of those taught by cultivating their minds, the other brings happiness, contentment, and joy in time and throughout eternity by being instrumental in bringing about the salvation of the soul; and both the teacher and the minister engage in a glorious work upon which the great God of the Universe showers His blessing and approves the instrumentalities used to bring about these glorious results. [Applause.] In my judgment, this is one of the most important measures before Congress, and so important was it that our great President of the United States, the greatest in my judgment since the days of Jefferson [applause], specifically urged the passage of this bill in his annual message delivered before Congress in December.

I congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES] upon his faithful, efficient, and conscientious work in bringing before the House of Representatives this great measure for our consideration and approval. On the 4th of March next he will go out of this House and retire to private life, to the regret, I am sure, of each and every Member on this floor on both sides of this Chamber. He is a most excellent and distinguished gentleman, one of the most faithful and efficient Members of this House, and one who enjoys the greatest respect and the largest confidence of the entire membership of the House of Representatives. [Applause.] He is in every sense of the word a "southern gentleman," in the truest and fullest sense of that term, and that means that he has the highest conception of integrity, chivalry, and honor, and is devoted to this great Government and the fundamental doctrines and principles upon which it was founded by the fathers of the Republic. In his devotion to it he has brought to bear his splendid talents, his energy, and his industry in working out this great bill, which will be a blessing to humanity. [Applause.] While he will leave here on the 4th of March, he will never be forgotten by the membership of this House, and he will not be forgotten by the boys and girls of this great country, for he will by this bill erect to himself a monument more imperishable and enduring than any monument of brass or of marble. By being instrumental in securing the passage of this bill and putting it upon the statute book as a law of the land, he will have a monument in the minds and in the hearts of the present generation and generations yet to come. May God bless him, and make his days of the future the best of his life, as he will be able as they pass by to contemplate with great satisfaction and genuine pleasure the imperishable and indestructible work he has performed in the interest of the whole country during his service in the House of Representatives. A nobler, more generous, or chivalrous man never served in this House or went out after faithful and efficient service from it to the private walks of life.

Long live our good friend, the chivalrous gentleman and our faithful coworker, Hon. DUDLEY M. HUGHES, of the grand old State of Georgia, which State he greatly honors. [Great applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I sometimes almost think that as a people we are overeducated mentally along cultural lines. Of course, I do not really think that we are overeducated in the broad sense or even up to the standard yet. For years we have been going on the principle of teaching a few things to train the mind in the primary schools, in the higher grades, and to a large extent in the colleges and the universities, and for the ordinary day labor we have relied upon immigration. Ever since I was a boy there has been a great work in looking after the railroads, digging the ditches, constructing sewers; and a large share of the manual labor, what we call the cheaper labor, has been performed by people who have recently come over from the other side. To a very large extent it is true that the children of those men do not follow the same occupations.

But we can not rely upon immigration for ordinary labor forever. What I say has reference particularly to labor in the North. We can not rely upon immigrant labor forever, and in order to get the American citizen, born and reared in this country, to do this class of labor, you have got to fix it so that he can do more work and get more pay. And it is along lines like these that we have got to look in the future to perform the necessary work in our Nation.

This is a step in that direction, designed to encourage young men, especially, to do the labor of occupational work or industrial work, and aid them, while they are learning with their arms to work, to know how to do the work better and more economically and more profitably for the country and for themselves, through teaching them in the mind how to better handle their hands.

Primarily, it is not the duty of the Government to do this. But we will have to prepare for these things because it is our duty to look into the long-distance future. We will have to prepare to-day for what will happen to our children and our grandchildren and our great grandchildren if we are to maintain the things that this Government and our Nation ought and do stand for. While it is not primarily the duty of the Government, we have adopted in reecnt years the policy of having the General Government encourage the local governments to do those things which primarily belong to the local governments, and of course one reason for that—and it may be a good reason—is that in the collection of taxes it is easier to raise money from the great centers of wealth when the expenditure of money in these directions is just as necessary in those localities where wealth does not center.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to extend the time for five minutes more.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, I am through with that line. It became my duty, Mr. Chairman, commissioned by the Republicans of the House, to suggest members of the various committees, including the Committee on Education. The Committee on Education has existed in the House for many years. Shortly after I came here, I think it was, or perhaps before I came, it was presided over by that distinguished patriot, that great citizen, Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, who was Speaker of this House at the time of the Civil War. But I think the committee was not treated too seriously at that time, just as various other committees are not treated in this House. It was one committee that was then known as "the lonesome-road committee," which to have a meeting would be to break a precedent. But when I named in three Congresses the Republican Members to go on the Committee on Education I realized the importance of the work that might come before that committee, and exercised as much care in selecting the Republican membership of that committee as I would exercise in selecting the membership of the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Ways and Means, or any others of the so-called ranking committees of the House. I picked out—I will not say the best material in the House, because it would be impossible to put all the best material in the House on one committee—but I picked out among the very best men in the House on our side to go on the Committee on Education. The proof of it would be in naming the men who are on the committee. They have done exceedingly good work. I am proud of the men on the committee and of our men on the committee. [Applause.]

I wish to congratulate, in his closing days in this House, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia. [Applause.] Anything that I say good about him now might not harm him, and I hope that the few words I have said about him before did not harm him in his district, though I am somewhat doubtful whether the words of the Republican leader of the House would be of benefit to a Democrat in a benighted district in Georgia, and I am sure his district was benighted. It was not when he was elected to Congress, but it surely was when it declined to return him. [Applause.]

He has the respect, the admiration, and the love of every Member of this House, and we all extend that feeling to him when he goes out from our midst. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized to proceed for two minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask leave to proceed for five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, an enforced absence prevented my being here when this bill was up for consideration heretofore. At this stage of its consideration I do not desire to take up much time. I want to say that I am now, and have been for years, in favor of this kind of education. I do not harbor the fears entertained by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], because I believe there is nothing materially new in what we are doing. The State is suffering less encroachment by the General Government in this than in many other measures favored by the section whence the gentleman hails. What we are doing now is simply coordinating that line of education which American citizens have been working out for themselves individually for a great many years.

If I had been opposed to this legislation, I should probably have been won to it by the statement of the romantic life and success of one of our leading Members, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The story of his life is almost as interesting as the magic story of Aladdin. It certainly will compare favorably with the story of Dick Whittington, who, pressed by poverty and oppressed by unkind employers, was leaving the world's metropolis, when the "Bow bells" spoke in a language which seemed to say, "Return, Dick Whittington, future lord mayor of London." Or like Ben Franklin who, penniless, walked those rough streets of Philadelphia, but which, under his genius, industry, and tact, smoothed and widened, led him to Congress halls, constitutional conventions, and finally into the presence of kings. Or still more modern, like Garfield, whose bare feet upon the towpath made it the highway to the Presidency. Our colleague, Mr. MADDEN, like each of these, utilized the best opportunities he had to discipline the mind and train the hand, which, when driven by unflagging industry, passed him through the gates denied the crowd to the position of power and a seat among the mighty. The 50 cents a day water carrier at 10, the night student at 27, became the capitalist and statesman at 50. That is a tribute at once to him for his achievement and to the Nation for its opportunity furnished now, as never before, for the young man or woman who will learn and do. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois started as a carrier of water, and noting the great importance of his vocation and its possibilities gave wings to his imagination and his ambiton. He went to night school, as he stated, for the purpose of developing the vocation in which he was interested and along the lines of his ambition. I am glad that he attained the zenith of a typically successful water carrier's career. In its development we now have the climax. Instead of carrying water he has become a statesman. I am told that a statesman's most delicate and important accomplishment is the carrying water properly, which means on both shoulders. [Laughter and applause.] In that I do not believe that my distinguished colleague has made as shining a success as some others have done. But he has made a success in his profession and vocation, and is now one of the statesmen of America. [Applause.]

If I had time to discuss this question, I should take distinctive issue with what was said on the floor to the effect that the boys of this country are leaving agriculture and going into the professions. The lawyers of this country are decreasing relatively year by year, as are the demands for their services. So are the other professions decreasing relatively year by year. But every year in this country, by leaps and bounds, the cultured, educated young men of the country are passing by law, medicine, and the ministry and entering into agriculture, and are making a success of it. I would like to say to the young men of the United States that not in law or medicine or any of the other professions are they most liable to find success in the next 25 years, but in agriculture throughout the United States. In our own State university young men are avoiding the law and the other so-called learned professions and year by year there is an increase of agricultural students. [Applause.]

This educational plan is based upon the desire of the Government, not to usurp the function of the State which would educate its own but to assist those States which are weak and in the places of their weakness. It is to the interest of the Federal Government to have, in so far as it can, an intelligent and homogeneous people. To this end the Government offers by this measure to cooperate with the States which will develop agriculture, trade, and industry, and home economics learning in a practical way. What the schools of the State are already successfully doing is not to be interfered with. The students who are being successfully dealt with are not to be disturbed. The efforts are to be directed toward those who need special opportunities.

The following are some of the facts that call for this cooperation between Nation and State: Eighty-five per cent of the children entering our public schools leave before they are 16 years of age; less than 8 per cent of our students entering the high school graduate therefrom. Few young men or women learn a trade. In fact, learning a trade through the old course of apprenticeship is seldom followed. And yet coordination of skilled hand and disciplined brain is more imperatively demanded now than ever before. The individual needs it for his own physical and intellectual development. The Nation needs it that its citizenship may be effective in the arts of peace and the methods of war. Intricate machinery, involving principles of mechanics, pneumatics, hydrostatics, and electricity are so numerously placed about us that handcraft and mental activity have abundant opportunity to profitably mingle.

This plan of education is for the youth above 14 years—for him or her denied of opportunity, or who have neglected opportunity. In either case the demands upon them to seek a livelihood, or their reluctance to study with those much younger than they, will often necessitate this night or part-day school provided for in this measure.

It gives me pleasure upon the passage of this measure to turn to a speech delivered on this floor April 22, 1912, in favor of the then Page-Wilson bill, of which the measure under consideration is a substantial reproduction.

I said, in part, on that occasion:

"The general purpose of this bill is to place the college of agriculture and mechanic arts at the head of a unified system of education relating to agriculture, the trades and industries, and home economics, extending through practically all the schools of the State, including bureaus of demonstration and extension work in each county. Further, while the present bill will set to work practical men as teachers of less practical men, the Page-Wilson bill will direct State colleges and normal schools in providing sufficient well-equipped teachers in the three great departments of practical learning. In short, while the present bill will reach but one great branch of vocational education, the Page-Wilson bill will comprehensively grasp our entire school system and make it useful to all the people who toil.

"The work sought to be done through this bill is not entirely new, nor will it be sporadic. In small and independent ways it is being attempted and wrought out in many different communities through private enterprises or municipal or State plan and aid. To do a thing in America our leaders in thought have but to see the need. Our enterprising men and women seek out, experimentally, the way and then the public, duly advised, places behind it its sanction and support, and within the lapse of reasonable time it is accomplished. Formerly we were a Nation hampered by overproduction, but that period is passed. Consumption, fast speeding on its way, is overtaking production, and our economists of all schools and parties agree that if America would feed itself its depleted soil must be restored. Its swamps and wastes must be reclaimed and the efficiency of its producers enhanced. If America would construct for times of peace and war the things which America needs, the strong hand must be taught to move obedient to a clear and active well-trained brain. So that our youths who will mingle our substances, shape our tools, and form our implements must bring about that mingling of hand and brain which comes only from proper training in the formative periods of life. [Applause.]

"There have been in times past vast sums spent in schools to train men to fight, schools to prepare them for business, schools to fit them for teaching, preaching, thinking, and the alleviation of suffering and the saving of life; but for the establishment and care of that bit of heaven here on earth, the home, where women and children's time is mostly spent and more of the husband and father's time should be, has been left to guess and haphazard. It was allowed to be wrought out from the doubtful experiences of too often antagonistic mothers-in-law who would fain perpetuate their own peculiar system of disorder upon the family constituted by the son of one and the daughter of the other. [Applause.]

"The young woman on the farm, coming from the sources of the foodstuffs and textile materials, has a better opportunity in our colleges and public schools, where domestic science shall be taught, to develop into intelligent educational conductors or superintendents of homes than are those reared in city life or factory shadow. As such, in the years to come, there will be a demand at an increased scale of salary. All reputable labor is honorable, and conduct of a home as wife or employee would be more desirable than toiling in factory; wearying at bargain counters, patiently withstanding, without rebuke, the sneers of haggling customers; or even enduring the strains incident to the teacher's life. And where the best women are, there men are usually found to linger, and many arrange to stay for life. With the poultry and dairy, the two best money-making departments of the farm, women are scoring financial success.

"As time goes on woman's activities in other farm departments will, with our improved facilities, take the lead and reap the benefits of farming's financial opportunities. Parlors and drawing-rooms are negligible apartments. Comfort and happiness lie in the sanitary kitchen, orderly dining room, and well-ventilated bedchamber. These three can always be had in the country. They constitute the best balm for family friction and the most potent antidote for divorce. [Applause.]

"There may be inspiration in tariff changes, in battleship construction, in transportation enterprise, in canal building, and many other activities of our Government, but I know of none entitled to more consideration than the Government seeking to aid the upbuilding of intelligent, well-ordered, sanitary, and happy homes, where the children are to be born who will appreciate and defend the Nation which took an interest in them and theirs. [Applause.]

"It is a matter of congratulation that the school forces of our country, the agricultural forces, and the labor forces are practically united upon this measure, and some day it will be a proud fact, to be recalled by every Member of this body, that he assisted, in whatever capacity, to crystallize into law the proposed measure.

"We are all disappointed in that our census figures show a strong current of our young life moving from the farm to the cities. Philosophers may think, economists may reason, and politicians debate, but one of the large reasons for the high cost of living is this selfsame drift. Upon the ocean currents move that mighty swelling force as if they would submerge the nearing continent, but neighboring and countering currents in due time set in, and the great balance is reestablished and maintained. So should our currents moving from farm to city, from city to village, and from village to farm not be a vast movement, but a nice balancing of currents, which will show the intelligent choice, based upon comfort and opportunity and all callings to become respectable, honorable, and desirable.

"I leave the discussion of the trade schools to Members from the large cities. Of them I am not well informed. I think, in a measure, I do know the farm and home, and whatever can be done to better them will better the generations to come and strengthen our Nation. This must be done if we would retain our leadership in the arts and industries. This must be done if the American race is ultimately to be built up as the distinctive leading race, to see the way, to lead the way, and to hold our rights for the enlightenment and betterment of all mankind." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, am I correct in understanding that general leave has been granted to extend remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. General leave has been granted for five days.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the Federal board for vocational education shall make an annual report to Congress, on or before December 1, on the administration of this act, and shall include in such report the reports made by the State boards on the administration of this act by each State and the expenditure of the money allotted to each State.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express something of the sentiment of the Committee on Education with regard to its chairman. I am very glad that the Hughes-Smith bill will be known hereafter, whenever it shall be referred to through the centuries to come—because it never will be repealed—as the Hughes-Smith law. I am very glad indeed that inseparably connected with this great law, which is now to be placed on our statute books, will be the name of its joint author, the man whom we so much love and respect here in this House—Mr. HUGHES. [Applause.] I am very glad also that throughout the entire progress of the inception and development of this bill he has been able to give it the benefit of his wisdom and sound judgment down to the present time. From the time when it was introduced and considered by the commission of which he was fortunately a member, throughout the deliberations of the committee and now on the floor of the House, we have had the benefit of his advice and assistance. If this law shall be considered as of great value, as I know it will be in the years to come, if thousands of young men shall look upon it as the primary incentive and the great opportunity that has made their lives a success, I know they will think of him in connection with this bill; and so, I assure him, a great blessing will come to him because of the association of his efforts and his name with this act.

I can not refrain from also voicing at this time the deep regret which I know every Member of the House feels that we are so soon to lose him, both from the committee and from the House. I know every Member of the House who has known him at all personally has learned to love him. They could not help but do so. One of my associates, speaking to-day in private conversation, said to me, "He is the highest type of a southern gentleman." I said to him, "I would amend that by making this statement, that he is the highest type of an American gentleman." [Applause.] Because I would not have it limited to a section, when it comes to the consideration of qualities like those he possesses in such an eminent degree. We are sorry to lose him from this House. We are sorry to lose him from the deliberations of this committee, and I sincerely hope he will realize that he takes with him the affectionate interest and love of every Member of the House throughout all the years to come.

And now, as we shall end our consideration of this bill, I sincerely hope that there will be such a unanimous approval of this legislation as will carry with it an added compliment to him, an added glory to the renown that will be his because of his having been the joint author of this great piece of constructive legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to trespass upon the patience of this committee, but I do not like to let the opportunity pass without expressing a word with respect to my approval of this legislation. I have been a school-teacher. I never rose to the dignity of a schoolmaster, or a professor, or a doctor of any sort, but as a school-teacher and as a man who has observed the problems of education, I have been impressed with the necessity for the establishment of some institution where special training might be obtained at public expense. I am somewhat of an old-fashioned man. I believe that every man who is born into the world is born with special qualifications for some occupation, and the problem which may determine success or failure is the problem of seeking to find out that occupation for which a man is most suitably fitted. In our common schools and even in our universities there is no special method by which a teacher may give particular attention to any individual pupil. The school-teacher who has charge of 50, 60, or 70 pupils can not have the time, in the very nature of things, to devote special attention to any one pupil or to any given line of thought or occupation, which is designed in the legislation now under consideration; and I am glad, Mr. Chairman, of the opportunity to vote for this bill, not only because it has been fathered by the distinguished and lovable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES], but because it provides a means whereby the United States Government shall to some small extent come to the relief and assistance of the boys and girls in this Nation who are seeking to unravel that mysterious skein which we call life, at whose heart, after all, lies the mystery and secret of success.

I do not share, I am glad to say, the fears of my distinguished friend from Texas. I do not look upon our Government as a monster, because the whole can be no worse than its component parts, and the whole of this Nation is made up of 48 States that compose it. I do not believe that our Federal Government is such a monster as to create in my mind any fear because it is cooperating with or assisting the States in things that mean the success and achievement of men who have come up like the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and dozens of others who sit on the floor of this House. I do not believe that the exercise of that power will be detrimental to our success and achievement, but, on the contrary, I consider it as one of the primal duties of the Federal Government to cooperate in the education and training of the boys and girls of this Nation. [Applause.]

[Mr. RAGSDALE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to bear with me just a moment. There is no Member of this House that can possibly appreciate the kind words so tenderly expressed more than I do. These words will be handed down as a legacy to my children and children's children, and, whatever may be the decree of the fates and whensoever a cloud may surround me, these words will be a beacon light. My countrymen, my beloved countrymen, my heart is too full for utterance, but it is all yours. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 703, the vocational education bill, and had reported the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUGHES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION BILL.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I gave notice that I would call up the conference report on the immigration bill (H. R. 10384) on Thursday next, immediately after reading the Journal. I desire now to change that to Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama gives notice that on Friday next, after the reading of the Journal and the cleaning up of business on the Speaker's table, he will call up the conference report on the immigration bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a memorial from the Legislature of Oregon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SNYDER, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of Catherine Beard, Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WEBB, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week on account of serious illness in his family.

THE NEWLANDS COMMISSION.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report (No. 1268) from the Committee on Rules.

House resolution 437.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of S. J. Res. 190, reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The first reading of the resolution shall be dispensed with, there shall be general debate not exceeding one hour, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the resolution. During the general debate any Member may be recognized by the Chair to offer germane amendments to the resolution. At the end of said general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and all amendments to final passage without any intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask how much time gentlemen on the other side would like to have on the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Fifteen minutes on this side.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the discussion on the rule be confined to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by myself and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and at the close of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be confined to 15 minutes on a side, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and at the end of 30 minutes' debate the previous question on the resolution shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, this is substantially the same rule that was presented to the House a few days ago for the purpose of bringing up the Newlands resolution and continuing the commission now investigating the transportation facilities of the United States. I have not carefully analyzed all of the provisions of the resolution that the rule brings up for consideration, but my information from those entitled to know, and who do know, is that a provision which provided for the continuation in office of a Representative in Congress after his term expires is eliminated, and that the increased appropriation is eliminated. At present I only desire to state that the joint resolution has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee has acted on the same and reported it to the House, and this rule brings up that joint resolution as reported by that committee. Mr. Speaker, I think that the report of the committee is practically unanimous, and therefore there is nothing else that I can add at this time that would enlighten the House. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the eliminations that have been made in the resolution, I am still opposed to it for reasons given on a prior day when the matter was under consideration in the House. I do not care to add at this time to the objections I then made to the resolution, and will now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to fight, and I never do unless I have to or unless I am performing a public service. I dislike very much to disagree with the majority, or with the members of the committee of which I am a member, but I feel called upon to do it in this instance, and also to vote against the special committee of the House or a majority of that committee from my side of the House. It is true that this resolution has been amended a little. They tried here the other day to lead in this Trojan horse in its worst form. The House refused to even consider the resolution as it was reported by the Committee on Rules, and introduced into this House by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They have taken this Trojan horse out, and they think they have sheared him until they have disguised him, and now they try to lead him into the city from another angle; but I want to say to the Members of this House that it is the same proposition to-day that it was when it was originally introduced into this House, and I want to say to some of you Democrats who stood up and voted your convictions here the other day and voted against this rule, who have for one reason or another allowed yourselves to be picked off, and who are going to vote to-day to adopt this rule, which means that this resolution will be adopted, that this fight has just begun. When you vote to report this Newlands resolution, when you vote to give that committee further life—a committee that has been in operation for more than seven months, which has examined one witness fully and three partially—you are voting for a proposition that the men who are behind it, the men who are the prime movers of this thing, admit is nothing less than an effort to take the control of transportation facilities entirely out of the hands of the States.

I want some of you gentlemen who have been howling around here about State rights to hear this. The very object of the Newlands committee, acknowledged by the men who are behind it, who are the fathers of it, is to destroy every right that the State now has and has ever had in the transportation question in this country. Who is behind it? Who has been up here calling out Members of this House and asking them to change their votes on this proposition and to adopt this rule? One eminent gentleman, able lawyer, general counsel for the Southern Railway, general counsel for the railway managers of the country, and when he speaks he speaks for 82 per cent of the mileage, called a Member of this House out, and made the statement before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which I shall relate. This gentleman asked, in substance, "What is your object in wanting this resolution adopted and this committee continued?" He replied, in substance, "My object is that I believe I can take my experts before that committee, that I can make that committee believe—perhaps not some other committee—but I can make that committee believe and recommend the absolute destruction of the rights of the States to control in transportation matters in this country." That is his object. He has shown a greater zeal in this matter than anyone else. It is said by those who advocate this measure that they have stricken one Member off this committee who will not be a Member of the next Congress, and that for that reason it is a great and good resolution. Mr. Speaker, I had as soon Judge CULLOP would help enact this farce as anyone. Let us see what this resolution contains. This committee has been in operation now for seven months, almost. This committee was to report back here the 8th of January. Nobody has seen any report, they have nothing to report. It is a do-nothing resolution, and its purpose is to kill legislation in this House that will be remedial. That is the object of the prime movers of this legislation, and there can be no question about that. They have had seven months in which to investigate the subject, and they have examined one witness fully and two or three more partially, and yet they want more time in which to investigate, and what have they got to investigate? Under the resolution they are—

To investigate the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce.

That is a part of what they have to investigate within 30 days. Also—

The subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, wireless, cable, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities and as to the comparative worth and efficiency of Government regulation and control as compared with Government ownership and operation.

They have to investigate all this within 30 or 40 days, and they are to have authority to sit during the recess of Congress. They have examined one witness in seven months, yet they claim they can investigate all of the acts to regulate commerce and everything in connection with interstate transportation, and Government ownership of every transportation facility as compared with private ownership. This resolution, I say to you to-day, has been held up in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; it has been held up on the floor every time a Member has tried to get up anything that would amend the interstate-commerce act. They have not investigated one subject named in the resolution in seven months, and they will not if you will give the railroads and some members of the committee all the time they want. They will not complete this investigation in seven years, and this resolution to extend this committee does not stop this thing. When Congress meets next December, they will be in here again wanting to extend this committee. The Interstate Commerce Commission down here, a body of patriotic men trying to perform a great public service, come into this Congress each year with recommendations and say, "We can not perform our functions as public officials and as servants of the people unless you give us added law"; but when you introduce a bill—when you want to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power they did not have in connection with the Louisville & Nashville case, to go into the records of that railroad prior to the effective date of the Hepburn Act, which was 1910—when you want to go into the correspondence of that railroad company, which the railroad company says you can not go into because it is not authorized by law, and when you attempt to cure that evil, as I have done, and try to get it up on the floor of the House, or when I try to pass it through the committee, I am met with the assertion that nothing ought to be done until this Newlands thing reports. When will it report? Will it be next week, or will it be next year, or will it be when we are bound hand and foot by the railroad corporations of this country? That is when it will be. But they say that I have introduced the bill and that I am talking about State regulation and State control when I have introduced a bill and had it reported from the committee that would give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power of veto over new issue of stocks and bonds, and take that away from the States. It is proper that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have that power. I am not fighting the State commissions when I advocate that.

The National Association of State Railroad Commissions in their last annual convention made nine recommendations to this Congress, and the only one of the nine recommendations upon which they united was that Congress should pass a law giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to regulate the issuance of stocks and bonds of this country. They themselves did not believe that that would be an invasion of their rights. Simply because my State and a great many other States have effective laws for the regulation of these issues of stocks and bonds by the railroads of that State, and my State has a clean railroad system that is causing every railroad that comes through the State to reincorporate within the State and to come before the commission, before they can burden themselves and the public with new issues of stocks and bonds, and other States do not have them, the railroad corporations of my State, clean and well managed, are mulcted of their substance for the benefit of railroads in other States where they can charge a rate that is unreasonable. And yet they come in here and say they intend to report this back in 30 or 40 days, and everybody knows it is one of the most tremendous and most far-reaching questions ever considered by any Congress, and they have not considered one case in seven months. I said here in December that the Newlands resolution was "chloroform." I repeat that statement. I do not mean to charge that the chairman of this committee, for whom I have the highest regard and the greatest affection, as being a party to that intentionally, but he has been used that way, I am sorry to say. You can pass this thing if you want to. This is progressive legislation, progressing backward several years, because every man who wants to do anything in this Congress or out of it with respect or in reference to the railroads of this country is told to wait, wait, wait until this Newlands committee shall report. I hope and I trust the Members on this side of the House who stood up the other day and voted their convictions will not be terrorized to-day, and if they do vote their convictions to-day this thing will meet the same fate it met last week. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, it is easily judged from the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], who has just addressed the House, that he is against this proposition [laughter], and being against it, his inventive genius can supply him with many suggestions, sound and unsound. The truth is that the President of the United States came before this body at the beginning of this Congress and recommended a general investigation of the conditions of transportation. Both Houses of Congress agreed to his proposition. Before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported the resolution, however, we had the railroad advocates to come before us and show their hands and in our printed hearings disclose what their proposition was. We went to work as soon as Congress adjourned, but Congress did not adjourn as soon as we expected. We had hoped that it would adjourn early in the summer and permit us to investigate those propositions. It adjourned, however, so late and the election came so early that we could not get to work until the 20th of November. We heard the railroads' case and we have not completed the cross-examination by which we hope to bring—I think the majority of the committee does—the same confusion to the railroads' case that the gentleman from Texas himself is advocating. Not all of the 10 members of that joint committee are servitors of the corporations. They are representatives of the people and they are trying to find out and present to the people evidence of what the truth is. We could write our individual reports right now, but we would like to complete the testimony, let both sides be heard, and let the people read the evidence on both sides and judge whether the railroads' claims ought to be adopted or whether we ought to go on as we have been doing, trying to improve the present system under which we have proceeded for years——

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman give for my information, and I suppose others, some idea as to when it will be possible for the gentleman's committee to make a report?

Mr. ADAMSON. We could make a report right now, but we would like to finish the cross-examination of witnesses who have testified direct, only four of them, not one as the gentleman stated, but four very important witnesses.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I will say, with all due respect to the gentleman, that that is entirely an evasion.

Mr. ADAMSON. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Certainly the chairman has some idea as to when his committee will report.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have stated in this House twice that, in my opinion, 40 days' work will complete it. Now, Mr. Speaker, when Congress met, the 10 members of that joint committee found themselves not only active Members of the two Houses, but active members of committees, and it was impossible for them to do two things at once and do justice to either. Therefore, contrary to the opinion of the gentleman from Texas, we made a formal report to Congress, as required in the original resolution, stated the facts, and requested an extension of time. We have worked as hard as we could, but we were not able to do justice to the subject by reason of the limited time and we ask for further time. We do not ask for an additional appropriation, we do not ask for anything except to extend the time in which we may complete the examination and make our report.

We have eliminated the proposition objectionable to some gentlemen the other day, of continuing the services of men on the committee after they had ceased to be Members of Congress. So the sole proposition in the resolution that has come here from the Senate and been reported back by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is to permit us to finish the job which it was impossible for us to complete without neglecting our important duties during the session of Congress. We have set until the 1st day of next December, but we will not expend any more money. We will do the work within the limits prescribed. We are avoiding all unnecessary expense. We are doing our best to verify our opinions with the evidence of some people; people who know something about it or profess to know something about it. We can write our own opinions and say that we know all about it now, but that is not what we were appointed to do. We can give our opinions as Members of the House. We are appointed to hear the people who profess to know something about it, and, after hearing and investigating, then report what we find from the facts.

And I think, Mr. Speaker, it was unnecessary to accuse anybody of being the servitors of corporations, because we are willing to turn the flood of daylight upon the whole matter. I am perfectly willing to risk the pushing of any centralization on me. I do not think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] can teach me anything about the rights of local self-government and honest government in this country. I think there are men on that committee able to bring out the contrary of anything that is wrong that anybody can bring out. And I will say to the gentlemen here, while there are three or four men there who have foolish ideas of national incorporation as a remedy for all things and certain things for breaking down State lines and local self-government, I think a great majority of us feel we are called to combat that proposition, and when there are any witnesses there to tell the truth, we will bring it out, and those who want good regulation I do not think need fear the efforts of that committee. I do not think the committee will ever recommend turning over the States bottom upward. We are in favor of maintaining the Government and maintaining the transportation systems and taking care of the shipper, and doing everything right, and we want to hear and report the truth to this House. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, the original Newlands resolution was inspired by the President's message delivered to the joint Houses in December, 1915. As a result of that message that resolution was introduced and was adopted and became a law in July last year. The interval between its adoption and the beginning of this session was too short for the subcommittee appointed under its provisions to make more than a preliminary survey. So far, therefore, as the other side of this Chamber is concerned, they can justify the adoption of this rule and resolution based upon the message of the President of December, 1915. This side of the Chamber has concern in this proposition by reason of a plank inserted in the Republican platform at Chicago last June, which reads as follows, and I read it because so few of the membership on this side of the House remember that such a plank was adopted. It says:

> Interstate and intrastate transportation have become so interwoven that the attempt to apply two and often several sets of laws to its regulation has produced conflicts of authority, embarrassment in operation, and inconvenience and expense to the public.
> The entire transportation system of the country has become essentially national. We, therefore, favor such action by legislation or, if necessary, through an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will result in placing it under complete Federal control.

That plank presents a proposition which has never been considered by a committee of Congress. And it is of sufficient importance to warrant a serious and careful investigation. I do not at this time express my views thereon. I will open-mindedly and willingly receive any testimony that may enlighten me, and that ought to be the attitude of the subcommittee, and it ought to be the attitude of Congress.

I have no sympathy with the self-sufficiency which characterizes some of the Members of this House when they say that we can not be enlightened upon these complicated questions of interstate traffic; that if we need information we can get it from governmental authorities. I am one who believes there are many men in this country who can give valuable information under the Newlands resolution if we will only hear them. This will not be an expensive proposition. We modestly ask for $24,000 to investigate the whole subject of transportation, to cover a field broader than has ever been intrusted for investigation to any committee of Congress, and we are to-day, under this resolution, to report at the first meeting in December next. Other commissions have been appointed, committees of inquiry that have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, and their field of inquiry was comparatively small and narrow compared with the field of inquiry to which this committee has been asked to direct its attention.

I have some sympathy with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] because of this resolution. He has been disappointed in failing to get consideration of his stock-and-bond bill. I helped him get it through the last Congress, I helped him report it out in this Congress, and I am ready to vote for it whenever an opportunity is presented. And let me remind him that whenever it was brought up on the Unanimous Consent Calendar no member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce opposed or objected to its consideration. It is not the membership of this committee to which has been intrusted the duty of making this investigation that stands as a buffer to the stock-and-bond bill. There are some other gentlemen in this House that have offered opposition. The gentleman from Texas ought not be disappointed in his failure to get action on his stock-and-bond bill. The longer he serves in this House the more of such disappointments he will have. Why, I remember bringing legislative children into this House for adoption only to find that they were soon absolutely kidnaped and appeared under the name of a foster parent in a subsequent Congress. [Laughter and applause.] Yet that does not deter me from continuing to support any legislation or investigation that will give to this country a better transportation system.

The gentleman from Texas is grieved possibly because of the Shreveport decision which was issued by the commission and sustained by the United States Supreme Court. And let me say to this House that the Shreveport decision is one that will give ever-increasing trouble and difficulty to the Interstate Commerce Commission unless we can find some way of settling these controversies. I am for a committee that will investigate these subjects. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, there are only three points to which I wish to address myself. In the first place, I desire to say that fundamentally I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman that he has the right to close. Does the gentleman from Kansas want any time?

Mr. HENRY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought it had been used.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the quotation from the Republican platform that my colleague [Mr. ESCH] has just made, I want to say that any Member who considers that plank as binding upon him should know it can not in any way affect the question now before the House, because any Member who does consider it binding upon him does not need any investigation by any committee to enable him to determine whether there shall be complete Federal control over the railroads; and as to any Member on this side of the House who does not consider that plank binding upon him, it of course has no bearing whatever upon this question.

Now, the distinguished chairman of the committee has corroborated the statement that I made when this resolution—or practically this resolution—was before the House the other day. I stated then that the members of this subcommittee were better qualified to make recommendations to this House and pass upon this question than any witness that had been called before that committee or any witness that would likely be called before that committee. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of the committee, has just stated to the House that that committee was now ready and prepared to write their report to this House, which meant, if it meant anything, that that committee did not need any further information; and he stated that the only purpose of continuing this committee was for the purpose of enabling that committee to cross-examine the representatives of the railroads who had appeared before them and confuse and confound them.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only difficult is that, while we members of the committee admit the truth of the gentleman's compliment, the balance of the people who pass on the fight may not agree with us.

Mr. LENROOT. I was just coming to that; and I submit this, that every Member of this House who has had any experience with those investigations will bear me out in the assertion that in the case of investigations of this character, involving many volumes of testimony, if it is not for the benefit of the members of the committee having the matter in charge it is not for the benefit of anybody else, because the percentage of Members of this House who read these volumes of testimony, outside of the members of the committee, is so small that it would have to be indicated by decimal figures.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I expect that this resolution will be adopted, not upon its merits, because upon the principal part of it the merits of it are the same to-day as they were last week; but it is expected that it will be adopted because the executive officers of this Government have been busy since this resolution was defeated last week and have importuned Members of Congress to change their votes; and it is expected that they will do so.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the representatives of the great railroads of this country have been busy with Members of this House—not illegitimately, of course—but they have been busy with the Members of this House since this resolution was defeated last week, and it is expected that their influence will be sufficient to change enough votes to-day to adopt this resolution now.

And I say here and now if this resolution is adopted to-day it will be not upon its merits, but it will be because of the importunities of the administrative officers of this Government and the importunities of the representatives of the great railroads of this country, who well know their purposes in continuing this committee, and their purposes are not in the public interest.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. If I have any time.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know that the gentleman stated, but is he in favor of national control of railroads?

Mr. LENROOT. That question is not before us now. I want to say with reference to that does the gentleman mean exclusive national control?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; exclusive national control.

Mr. LENROOT. I will meet that question when it is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, there are three phases of this question to which I wish to address myself. In the first place, I desire to say that fundamentally I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. I am not in favor of the exclusive Federal control or Federal chartering of the transportation facilities of this country. For one I believe in the integrity and in the powers of the various State railroad commissions, and I hope that they will be preserved by Congress as well as by the respective States.

It is not inappropriate for me to say here—and I hope I speak it with proper authority—that the President believed that he had good reasons when he asked Congress to continue this commission for a while longer. I know nothing about the railroad presidents who have been importuning Members of Congress. They have not importuned me. But, Mr. Speaker, here is the President of the United States endeavoring to deal with a great transportation problem, and I believe we will all concede that he is striving to do it in an honest and upright way. He asks Congress for a little further time in aiding him to make this investigation.

Now, some gentlemen on this side objected to this resolution, because it had within its provisions a clause that would continue in office a Member who had not been reelected to Congress. That clause is stricken out; that objection no longer obtains, and I think those gentlemen who voted against the resolution on that ground will concede, upon reflection, that they ought to comply with this request of the President of the United States. I think the gentlemen on that side will agree to that. We are all trying to arrive at a correct conclusion about this great problem, which must be settled by the Congress of the United States and the various States of the Union.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I have not time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I wanted to ask how the President made this request?

Mr. HENRY. I am glad to answer that. I think it is proper for me to state that the President made a personal request of me, as the chairman of the Committee on Rules, to lay this matter before the House after the committee had taken action, if they acceded to his views, and he has made the request in a message, as I understand; but I think it has been done in polite and respectful terms, and for one I always respect a request like that. It has not been my privilege always to agree with the President, and I do not know that I will agree with him about this question. I prefer to stand for the same thing that my friend and colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] stands for in regard to the power and life of the railroad commissions of the States being maintained as they are. But I have not arrived at that stage of my reasoning where I am willing to say to a committee that has taken only part of the testimony that now they shall not take the other part and develop the very proposition in which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and myself are vitally interested. I believe this case should be completed, and therefore I urge the adoption of the rule and the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. HENRY) there were—ayes 83, noes 59.

Mr. HILLIARD. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not, but the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-nine Members, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 219, nays 126, answered "present" 3, not voting 85, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. PATTEN (for) with Mr. BENNET (against).

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, when this resolution (S. J. Res. 190; H. Rept. 1269) is laid before the House and read I shall ask that general debate be dispensed with and that a vote be taken. I think it has been discussed by all Members who wish to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all general debate be dispensed with. The Chair would like to inquire who has the engrossed copy of the bill? The Chair supposed that the one the Clerk had was the engrossed copy, but it seems that it is not.

Mr. MANN. Of course, we can not proceed without the engrossed copy.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the request of the gentleman from Georgia will affect the right to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER. The rule says that amendments shall be offered during general debate.

Mr. BLACK. I shall have to object to the gentleman's request if it does.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to the gentleman offering his amendment now.

Mr. BLACK. Then I will offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only purport of my request is to dispense with general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if general debate is dispensed with the bill ought to be read for amendment.

Mr. MANN. But under the rule, Mr. Speaker, the bill can not be read for amendment. It is a foolish, useless, unnecessary, and almost criminal provision that amendments can be offered only in general debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. I made my request plain enough, and I do not object to amendments being offered now and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that the rule provides that there shall be an hour of general debate, or not exceeding one hour, and that during this general debate amendments may be offered.

Mr. ADAMSON. My request for unanimous consent is to dispense with the debate, and gentlemen may be recognized to offer amendments in any way they choose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that general debate be dispensed with and that anybody who wishes to offer an amendment may do so.

Mr. BLACK. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker, unless I have the right to discuss my amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, does not the rule provide for offering amendments?

The SPEAKER. It provides that amendments may be offered during general debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. Unless we can reach some agreement, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to withdraw my request.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. BORLAND. I rise to ask the chairman whether it would not suit his purpose to ask unanimous consent that the general debate provided for by the rule be dispensed with and that the resolution be read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I should object to that. Nobody is required to talk on the resolution if he does not wish to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

Page 2, line 10, after the word "seventeen," insert the following:

"Provided, That so much of said S. J. Res. 60 (Public Res. No. 25, 64th Cong.), approved July 20, 1916, as authorizes and empowers said joint subcommittee to investigate the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, wireless, cable, telephone, express companies, or railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. We do not have the Senate resolution in print, so far as I know. Is it the same as the substitute reported by the committee to the House?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; it is identical. I thought it was printed. It was referred to our committee and reported back.

Mr. MANN. It may be printed, but I have not seen it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday we had a rule before the House somewhat similar to the one we have voted on this afternoon, except that the rule we were then called upon to adopt made in order a resolution which would have continued as a member of this subcommittee a Member of Congress whose term of office will expire March 4, 1917, and provided an additional appropriation. The resolution which we now have before us and to which I have offered the amendment just read does not do that. If this resolution that we now have before us is adopted, it will authorize the continuance of the life of the Newlands-Adamson subcommittee. That committee, as we have already understood from the discussion on the floor of the House, consists of five Members of the Senate who are members of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and five Members of the House who are members of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This subcommittee is proceeding under a resolution adopted July 20, 1916, part of which I will take the time to read in order that Members who have not read the resolution may be familiar with its contents.

That resolution is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Committee of the House of Representatives on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through a joint subcommittee to consist of five Senators and five Representatives, who shall be selected by said committees, respectively, be, and they hereby are, appointed to investigate the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce, also the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, wireless, cable, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities and as to the comparative worth and efficiency of Government regulation and control as compared with Government ownership and operation, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress and with power to summon witnesses, to administer oaths, and to require the various departments, commissions, and other Government agencies of the United States to furnish such information and render such assistance as may, in the judgment of the joint subcommittee, be deemed desirable, to appoint necessary experts, clerks, and stenographers, and to do whatever is necessary for a full and comprehensive examination and study of the subject and report to Congress on or before the second Monday in January, 1917; that the sum of $24,000, or so much thereof as is necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution and to pay the necessary expenses of the subcommittee and its members, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said subcommittee, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such subcommittee.

Approved, July 20, 1916.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the effect of the amendment which I have offered, and which I hope will be adopted by this House, is to repeal that provision of the resolution which gives this committee authority and empowers it to investigate the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, wireless, cable, telephone, and express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities. Mr. Speaker, as one Democrat who I hope still entertains some allegiance to the time-honored doctrines of our party, I am opposed to the Government ownership of railroads, telegraph and telephone lines, and other doctrine of that kind. [Applause.] I am opposed to this Democratic House of Representatives deliberately authorizing the committee to encumber the records of this House with an investigation on those subjects. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman just spend a few minutes of his time in rehearsing some of those time-honored principles which he is talking about?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I have never known the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS] to be an exponent of very many of them. [Applause and laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I have the kindest personal regard for my colleague, the gentleman from Texas, but I can remember when, as a champion of the Populist Party in the days gone by, he was preaching this doctrine of Government ownership of railroads throughout the district which I have the honor to represent. As a Democrat I was against such doctrine then, and I am still against it. Mr. Speaker, the situation which confronts this country is not the question of Government ownership of these public utilities, but it is the question as to how they ought to be regulated and controlled and made to serve the people's interest, and I believe that ought to be the investigation task of this committee.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is the gentleman afraid that this committee will make him change his views? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. I am not; but I do not wish the Democratic Party to be placed in the attitude of giving sanction to the socialistic doctrine of general Government ownership of railroads, and so forth. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, there is a growing disposition in this country, every time anything goes wrong in any private enterprise, for some men to forthwith rise up and say, "Let the Government buy it and run it." I have never seen anything which leads me to believe that the Federal Government has demonstrated any conspicuous business ability in the conduct of its affairs. My observation leads me to quite a contrary belief. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman think there is quite a distinction between giving sanction to a thing in advance and hearing a discussion about it?

Mr. BLACK. I will say in answer to the gentleman that I do not think we ought to fritter away the time of this committee in a useless investigation of that kind. I believe that the task of this committee ought to be to investigate such questions as the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers, and in promoting the public interest, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission. These, I think, are the kind of subjects that this committee should be directed by this House to investigate, and not waste any of its time investigating the question of Government ownership of railroads, express companies, telegraph and telephone lines, and so forth. The country needs and ought to have some such relief as would be provided by the bill that my friend from Texas, Mr. RAYBURN, has introduced, which, in substance, gives the Federal Government the control of the issuance of the stocks and bonds and other securities of these railroads. [Applause.] I believe that the time has come when the people are entitled to a square deal in this matter, and they are not receiving it so long as the public are paying freight on fictitious valuations and watered stock. The stockholders of these corporations are not receiving a square deal so long as stock is sold them which does not represent honest value, and it is time that the American Congress set to work and devoted its attention to the real task at hand of correcting some of these known evils, instead of chasing off after some will-'o-the-wisp, and I hope that this amendment which I have offered will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Texas rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. To discuss this amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to it?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What authority has the Speaker to say that the gentleman is recognized for five minutes?

The SPEAKER. Because the rule says that amendments shall be debated for five minutes on a side.

Mr. MANN. The rule says that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. MANN. I think not. The rule says that there shall be an hour of debate, 30 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware that the special rule says that.

Mr. MANN. This is all general debate.

The SPEAKER. General debate for an hour.

Mr. MANN. Thirty minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the Speaker has any right to limit the time. I call attention to it simply to show how foolish the rule is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not passing upon the wisdom of the rule. The Chair was talking about general debate. This rule provides for an hour of general debate, 30 minutes to be allotted to those who favor it and 30 minutes to be allotted to those who are against it. From which side is the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS] to be taken?

Mr. MANN. He has to determine that. I do not know. God forbid that I should speak for him. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The language is apparent that he can not speak over 30 minutes. The Chair was wrong about the 5 minutes.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OGLESBY. My question is on this point: Is not, as a matter of fact, this gentleman speaking to the amendment and not on the proposition?

The SPEAKER. Of course, the special rule provided that amendments should be offered during general debate, but it does not provide they should be offered at any other time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman from Texas recognized for 30 minutes or such part as he desires to use?

Mr. MANN. He must be if nobody else wants to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. Well, it seems to the Chair that that suggestion is correct. Whether anybody else wants to debate or not, the Chair does not know.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEELY. It is perfectly clear we could stop the gentleman at the end of 30 minutes, is it not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not speak on one side more than 30 minutes. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have stood all this time like a lamb dumb before the shearer. Now, I certainly see no objection to inquiring into all the whys and wherefores involved in the proper regulation, control, and management of the great railroad lines of this country, and I am simply standing by the resolution that passed the Senate and was brought over to this body by recommendation of our President, and I voted for the resolution with the understanding that we were to go into every element involved in the case, and I have no objection to having the entire facts. We have it in the sworn records of this company that a man by the name of Mellen stood and paid out something like $70,000,000 in one day to persons he did not know, had never seen, and for something he had no idea of its value, and under similar process charged stupendous sums against one of the great railroads of this country to be levied upon the industry of even the unborn generations by the railroad managers of this country. We have in the sworn records that men in the management of railroad systems have builded feeders and subsidiary lines up into the millions of dollars' worth, doubled and trebled the stock and bonds of those subsidiary lines, sold to themselves at two and a half and up to five times the cost of production and charged it up to the parent company, put the millions of cash in their pockets, and levied that tribute upon the commerce of this country, a fixed charge against traffic for the next 50 to 75 years. I could go on for two hours and give you the history of these matters, but it is not necessary. This is an administration measure. The scope of this resolution is to investigate all these problems. I had it thrown into my face when I was in the campaign by at least a dozen Republicans where I spoke that we had acted hastily when we passed the eight-hour law, and they asked why we did not wait and investigate. I looked them in the face and said that we felt like the house was on fire, and we had to put out the fire first and investigate later as to who started the fire. [Applause.] I told them the President was willing to investigate, to spend plenty of time investigating——

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I yielded a good deal of time when I stood in silence, I am talking now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman from Missouri pocket his smile and sit quiet awhile? I said I was perfectly willing to continue the investigation. Why? To see if there is any decent method on God Almighty's earth to explain why they let men literally rob the New Haven & Hartford Railroad, like robbing a bee gum, and pocket millions. I said I was perfectly willing to have them explain how Mr. Gould's system could pay $5,000,000 for a man to stand by the side of one female member of his family in Europe and become her husband and charge it up to the Missouri Pacific line and run it into bankruptcy, and then pay $3,000,000 to get loose from him and charge that up to another Pacific system and run it into bankruptcy. [Applause.] I am perfectly willing for all these matters to be explained. I could go on for an hour and ask for explanations of all these lines that have been filched. I am speaking for the unborn. [Applause.] Now, I just want to look at my very excellent young friend over here, Mr. BLACK, who taunted me with the statement that he had never known me to stand for many of the time-honored doctrines of Democracy. I took nine volumes of Thomas Jefferson (congressional edition), went all over this Republic defending those doctrines, and I helped to write the first national demand for an income-tax law ever put into a national platform in the United States, and the gentleman was in knee breeches then. [Applause.] I helped write the first national platform that was ever made demanding the direct election of United States Senators, and advocated these all over this country with Bryan and other glorious Democrats.

I helped to write into a national platform in the State of Oregon the first demand for the initiative, referendum, and recall, and volunteered my services and went back there and made 60 speeches when we adopted it in that State, and we worked that principle of Democracy so well that we made a Republican legislature send a good Democratic Senator to the United States Senate, thank God! [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the gentleman from my district was living in ease and luxuriance, quietly rusticating, and now taunts me with the statement that I never stood for many of the time-honored principles. I challenge him to point out one plank in the Democratic platform I did not stand for 25 years ago. I volunteered my services, and when Mr. Bryan was nominated in 1900 I was commissioned by J. G. Johnson, of Kansas; "Jim" Jones, of Arkansas; and Marion Butler, of North Carolina, the three national chairmen, for five months to organize the Silver Republicans, Populists, and Bryan Democrats into clubs. I made 300 speeches and traveled 46,000 miles by rail. What was the gentleman from my district doing? He was sucking his thumb, perhaps, and wondering if he would ever get to Congress. [Laughter.] I have been called by telegram into a hundred Democratic campaigns. Mr. Burleson, knowing my devotion to Jeffersonian Democracy, sent for me in the last campaign—wired to national headquarters that I was one of the best campaigners in the United States representing the Democracy of Jefferson, Wilson, and Bryan. [Applause and laughter.] I had nothing to do with it, except to thank him and accept their request and campaign a large part of the West. I have been called often by telegram in every national campaign for 25 years, and if I had devoted my time in staying at home to practice law like he did I could have had plenty of money, plenty of it; but I gave my time to the public. I wore the backs off of nine volumes of Thomas Jefferson, traveling largely at my own expense, and had them rebound. [Laughter.]

I am very much obliged, my friends. I just wanted to give you a little history that perhaps you were not acquainted with. I thank you. I want the resolution to cover a thorough investigation, as pledged by President Wilson when we passed the eight-hour law. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS and Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] a member of this committee?

Mr. SIMS. Not a member of the Rules Committee, but a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] rise?

Mr. SHERLEY. I rise to state my opposition to the amendment that has been offered.

Mr. SIMS. I want to speak in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, because I think it will have the effect to defeat any legislation at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time was used by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS] in favor of the resolution?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] wants to address himself to that subject, I will gladly yield to him, if I have anything to yield.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry. There was 1 hour's time, 30 minutes to be used by those in favor of the resolution and 30 minutes by those who oppose it. Each of the gentlemen who have spoken are in favor of the resolution, although they have not confined their remarks to it. Now, who is going to determine the control of the time of those opposed to the resolution?

Mr. ADAMSON. I can not understand to save my life that the gentleman from Texas favored this resolution, because he tried to take all the meat out by the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, as far as his opinion as to whom this time ought to be charged up to is concerned, will state that the first gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] was against the resolution and the second gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS] in favor of the resolution.

Mr. ADAMSON. I recognized that, I thought.

The SPEAKER. Under this rule nobody controls the time, and the duty of the Chair is, when a gentleman rises, to ask him which side of this resolution he is on. It leaves 25 minutes to a side. Now, on which side is the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am in favor of the resolution and opposed to the amendment that has been offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized in favor of the resolution.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I need not say to those who have known me here for some years that I am not now an advocate of Government ownership of railroads. But the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] serves to go very much further than to eliminate that particular subject from the inquiry. I am not one of those who expect great results from inquiries of this kind, but inasmuch as we are to have the inquiry I think it would be very unwise to adopt the amendment that was offered. The amendment would eliminate from consideration not only the question of Government ownership of railroads but the question of Government ownership of telegraph, telephone, and wireless communication.

Now, especially in regard to the latter, there may be peculiar reasons outside of economic ones why the Government should take control of wireless communication.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. There are reasons which would apply to telegraph and telephone communication that would not apply to railroads. These subjects are all distinct, and I do not believe that the House commits itself to the adoption of any policy simply when it authorizes an inquiry touching a given matter.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. I will just say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I will offer an amendment to the amendment to eliminate the limitation that they have put on wireless apparatus, because I can see good reasons why the Government in a military sense and for military purposes should control this wireless apparatus. The point I meant to speak to was the public-utility feature.

Mr. SHERLEY. To that extent the gentleman has improved his amendment. I am not prepared now to say that we ought to exclude any inquiry as to telephone and telegraph.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think this committee has any jurisdiction over wireless?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not prepared to say it has, but I am not particularly concerned when the committee is engaged in an inquiry as broad as this and when its power is simply to report as to whether one of the subject matters comes within the ordinary jurisdiction of that committee.

I simply wanted to suggest to the House that if you are going to have the inquiry there is no value in eliminating all of these subject matters. They will not be exhausted by the inquiry made by this committee, and doubtless some of them will not even be touched before the time arrives for them to make a report But for us to just offhand curtail any inquiry of that kind that the committee might develop in the hearing in some way, and which might be valuable as throwing light on the main subject, would be to my mind unwise, and I do not desire that that phase of the question should be overlooked. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to amend the amendment by striking out the word "wireless."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to amend his amendment by striking out the word "wireless"?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I ask unanimous consent to do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to modify his amendment by striking out the word "wireless." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say.

The SPEAKER. Which side does the gentleman speak for?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am against the amendment. I am in favor of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I agree cordially with what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has just said. I do not know that I can add anything to that statement further than to say that this investigation is simply, as I understand, to make an inquiry with a view to presenting the testimony of witnesses and possibly the conclusions of the committee upon facts that are of very great importance to the people of the United States to consider.

As the gentleman from Kentucky said, by the adoption of this resolution we do not commit ourselves to the adoption of anything that the committee may recommend, or to the adoption of Government ownership or anything else; but facts and a knowledge of facts can not injure any man whose mind has any strength at all. This is nothing but to acquaint us with facts and add to the sum, possibly, of knowledge in the House of Representatives, although that seems a somewhat difficult task; but I think it can be accomplished [laughter] if we tell this committee to go on, as the gentleman from Kentucky said, and investigate this important subject and report the facts which they find.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Black amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division. Those in favor on a division will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-eight gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ninety-nine gentlemen have arisen in the negative. On this question the ayes are 48 and the noes are 99.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the point of no quorum. On this vote the ayes are 48 and the noes are 99, and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Under the rule the previous question was ordered, and the resolution and the amendments are to be voted on.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides for an hour's debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. For not exceeding an hour's debate.

The SPEAKER. Yes; for not exceeding an hour's debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. If there is no other amendment, we are ready for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Maybe somebody wants to discuss the question. If nobody wants to speak, the Chair will put the question on agreeing to the joint resolution.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, is the time all exhausted? If not, I would like to be recognized as against the resolution for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. There is no trouble about that. The trouble is the bother with the rule.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this subject has been investigated all the way from here to the Union Station. [Laughter.] It does not make any difference how much investigating you do; you can not get any more knowledge on it than is available for everybody already.

What I wanted to say chiefly, however, was to correct what seemed to be a general misapprehension of the economics of railroad rates. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS] expressed it. The general supposition seems to be that the capitalization of the railroads has something to do with the rates charged for transportation. The idea is that if the railroad is capitalized high its rates must be high, that the high capitalization is charged up to the public. There is not a scintilla of evidence showing that that is true.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. PLATT. No; I can not yield at present.

Mr. GORDON. I can show you that you are mistaken.

Mr. PLATT. I know of two railroads in the State of New York which illustrate the situation. One has a high capitalization, and the other a low one, but their rates are the same practically. The road with the higher capitalization could not charge more if it wanted to, without losing its business. It is a matter of economics. Before the Interstate Commerce Commission and other regulating bodies interfered, the railroads used to charge what they could get, or, as railroad men say, "What the traffic would bear," and the railroad having a high capitalization could not get any more than the railroad having a low capitalization. Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission regulates the matter, but within lines fixed by economic law.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not deny the gentleman's statement that we all know about this already. The trouble is that we know it in different ways. Some of us know it one way and others know it another way. What we want to do is to clarify the situation and make it plain to all.

Mr. PLATT. I do not believe that the committee can clarify a situation which has been cleared up by the president of Yale University and many others who have written books about it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. The point that has just been made was as to the effect of overcapitalization, that it would not affect railroad rates. That is the opinion of very many railway economists.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; and they are right.

Mr. LEWIS. Now another question.

Mr. PLATT. Very well.

Mr. LEWIS. First in the case of a railroad that is already overcapitalized by one hundred millions. There are such cases.

Mr. PLATT. Possibly.

Mr. LEWIS. Upon which $100,000,000 dividends are paid to the extent of $5,000,000 a year. Is it not a fact that in such case the $5,000,000 that goes to pay dividends, instead of making a reserve and surplus, determines the ability of that railroad to finance new projects and finance betterments and earnings devoted to paying dividends on watered stock directly curtail the railway in its necessary financing? Now, answer that question.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman has finished, I will say that I believe that is true to a certain extent. That is, overcapitalization does do something to cripple the finances of a railroad, and it ought to be stopped, and I believe in some such measure as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has advocated, a plan to regulate the issue of stocks and bonds. We do that in the State of New York through our public-service commission, and we do it there very effectively; but when I say that I do not say that the capitalization of a railroad has any effect on the rates which it may charge. It has no effect. There is no evidence whatever that that makes any difference. Take the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., which was so woefully mismanaged, to say the least, where millions of money were spent foolishly——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Looted.

Mr. PLATT. Looted, if you please to say so. I will not greatly object to the use of that term. But the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has not raised its rates since then, and can not. It could not raise them, even if the Interstate Commerce Commission were abolished, to any considerable extent. Rates have nothing to do with capitalization and have never had anything to do with it.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course, the capitalization of a railroad has this effect: That railroad companies which are overcapitalized seek to fix their charges upon their capitalization. But the courts have held in every case, both the Supreme Court of the United States and the courts of the States, that they would not allow an overcapitalization to influence the determination of the question as to whether a rate was confiscatory, but that has to be determined upon the value of the property, regardless of what the artificial capitalization is. If in any case the question should come up whether a rate fixed was confiscatory, it would not be determined upon the capitalization, but it would be determined upon the value of the property. In that sense the gentleman is entirely right.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with the gentleman on that, though he is talking about law and I am talking about economics. Of course, when the rates of a railroad are attacked and when the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body seeks to lower those rates the railroad sets up the claim that if its rates are lowered it will not be able to pay its fixed charges, interest, dividends, and so forth. It is natural that a railroad should set up that claim, but that does not prove by any means that capitalization has anything to do with rates. The rates as they were formerly fixed, and as they are fixed to-day, are substantially according to the value of the service, or what the traffic will bear, as railroad men say, and the capitalization has nothing to do with it. Many cases might be cited to show that capitalization has nothing whatever to do with rates.

Mr. DOWELL. When rates are fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, is not capitalization taken into consideration in fixing or in raising those rates?

Mr. PLATT. I do not think it is taken into consideration at all, except as a matter of law. The railroads, of course, set up the claim that their charges must be considered.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not that set up each time as a reason why the rates should be raised, because it is said the railroads are not receiving sufficient revenue to pay dividends on the capitalization?

Mr. PLATT. They will set it up as a claim, but that is not the economic reason for the fixing of rates and never has been and never will be.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not that one of the reasons that they urge—that they are not receiving a sufficient return on the investment?

Mr. PLATT. Of course, that is one reason that they urge. They have their capitalization, their stock and bonds already issued and in the hands of the public, and they are more or less bound to protect their investors; but that does not make the rates.

Mr. DOWELL. Would there be any harm in making an investigation to determine whether the railroads are overcapitalized?

Mr. PLATT. Those facts are already secured and published in a thousand volumes that you can get in the Congressional Library to-day, and if the committee spent a hundred thousand years in taking testimony they could not add anything to what has already been published on that subject. [Applause.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Which side is the gentleman on?

Mr. MURRAY. I am for the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. MURRAY. How much time is left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes on the affirmative side.

[Mr. MURRAY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To ask for recognition. I wish to reply to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] on his proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman for the resolution?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] will agree that he was mistaken as to whether the amount of stock and bonds can be taken into consideration in fixing the rate. That question has been definitely decided for the people of the United States in the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court, volume 169, Smyth against Ames, in an opinion rendered by Justice Harlan. I call the gentleman's attention to what the court said on page 546:

> We hold, however, that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And in order to ascertain that value the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses are all matters for consideration and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case.

Therefore it is a matter which enters into the determination of what is a just rate for the railroad to charge. That is, I mean the matter of the amount of value of its bonds and stocks. One element which affects the reasonableness of the rates to determine whether they are confiscatory——

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman argue that the rate should be fixed upon the amount of stock and bonds and not on the value of the property?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not contend anything but what the Supreme Court said. The gentleman from Indiana did not understand the purport of the decision. I will read that portion of the opinion again which answers his question.

Mr. BARNHART. I understood the gentleman to say that it was value of the stock and bonds and not the value of the property.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, no; the court says:

> We hold, however, that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And in order to ascertain that value, the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and maket value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I voted for this rule, and I am going to vote for the resolution; but I have heard from those about me the suggestions that those who were in favor of the resolution are in favor of Government ownership of railroads. I want to make myself understood on that point. I have taken occasion at another time in this Congress to point out the trend toward paternalism in the administration now in power with such criticism as I could make. I think it is serious. I am not in favor of Government ownership. I have many reasons why I think I should be opposed to it, and I believe that knowledge and information is the surest way to prove that the Government can not afford to go into a project of Government ownership. [Applause.]

I think that when we act without information we are acting with a good deal of prejudice, and when we act with prejudice we never act sanely or safely. I do not believe that we should undertake to suppress public opinion, but I do think that we ought to direct public opinion, and we can not direct it unless we have information. As an opponent of Government ownership of railroads I am going to vote for the plan to secure the information that I think will enable our people to see why we ought not to have Government ownership, but to keep it under private control, with Government regulations.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to ask the gentleman when he makes his speech on the trend toward paternalism if he will not be fair enough to go back two or three previous administrations to get the foundation there.

Mr. FESS. I think my friend from Indiana is justified in saying that there has been a paternalistic trend before this administration, but I never have seen anything equal to the present administration, and I think my friend is going headlong where he does not want the Government to go. It is simply appalling to me. In the last session the amount of money we have spent in governmental functions that ought to be retained in private enterprise is simply appalling to me, and I do not want to be recorded in voting for this resolution as being in favor of Government ownership, for I will fight it when it comes on the floor.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for two minutes, which is all that remains on that side.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this resolution. I favor the most thorough investigation of this subject matter. I propounded the question to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] with reference to the manner in which the rates are now fixed for transportation. This inquiry was fully answered by the gentleman from Wisconsin presenting his authority that in fixing the freight rates the stock and the valuation of the stock is one of the things considered in fixing the rates.

I voted against the amendment presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], because I favor the adoption of the original resolution, and a full investigation of the entire subject matter. I think this investigation should be made for the purpose of presenting all of these facts before Congress in order that we may know what legislation is necessary.

Mr. PLATT rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. PLATT. I rise to oppose the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has made one speech, and the rule is that he can make but one.

Mr. PLATT. But the gentleman from Wisconsin has made two.

The SPEAKER. That was an oversight on the part of the Speaker. [Laughter.]

[Mr. WINGO addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time.

The SEAKER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

The question was taken and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. A division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the yeas and nays. [After counting.] Twenty-five gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number and the resolution is passed.

Mr. WINGO. No; Mr. Speaker, the House was in the act of dividing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. The House was in the act of dividing when the demand was made. We are entitled to a division, because that was never had.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 146, noes 61.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of no quorum and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and fifty-eight Members are present; a quorum.

So the joint resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriation for the services of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to six hours, three hours of that time to be controlled by the chairman and three hours by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], the ranking minority member of the committee.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAGUE. For a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether or not all the time of the minority is to be controlled by one member who has filed one minority report as against five other members who have also filed a minority report and whether or not we are entitled to a portion of that time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the gentleman from Massachusetts that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to not more than six hours, and that he control one half and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] the other half. He is asking unanimous consent.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] whether or not we can arrange for a division of the time, the other minority members having a part of the time.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think I will be fair in allotting time to those who are entitled to it, but I do not want to make an agreement to waive the portion of the time that the chairman proposes on my side of the question. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] is opposed to certain features of the bill, and I will be disposed to yield him time in case I can without curtailing others.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] say to that?

Mr. TAGUE. I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought to have some agreement as to time. I think the members of the committee who have filed a minority report, five of them, are entitled to at least a fair portion of the time. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are very many Members in this House, living in cities affected by some of the legislation now on this bill, who have asked for time, and I think, Mr. Speaker, we should be entitled to at least half of the time controlled by the minority. And I will ask, Mr. Speaker, that we be allowed one hour and a half of the three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. MANN. That is not a fair request.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, the item to which the gentleman is opposed is only a small part of the bill. It is only one item out of several hundred. The only point in which the gentleman from Massachusetts is interested is one item of appropriation amounting to $400,000 and some odd, which he wants to raise to $800,000, and there are $300,000,000 carried in the bill. Therefore I do not think that that item to which he is opposed ought to take half of the time of the whole bill. I can not agree to that. I have told the gentleman that if I have time to spare that is not spoken for by members of the committee, or those entitled to speak, I will grant it. The gentleman knows I am opposed to the provision. I have made a minority report against the provision of which the gentleman speaks, and he made an additional minority report several days after the minority report was filed. So we are on the same side as to that item. It does not seem to me they ought to control half of the time on this bill because they are interested in one item, on which I am with them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the time upon appropriation bills is usually divided by the center aisle, the Democratic side having half of the time and the Republican side half of the time. I should suppose that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] might be able to get some time from this side of the House, but he ought to get most of his time, I should think, from his own side of the House.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I make this suggestion, reserving the right to object, that if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] yields to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] 45 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] likewise yields to him 45 minutes, it would make him an hour and a half——

Mr. MANN. Why should we give the same amount of time from this side to the gentleman from Massachusetts? He is not the only pebble on the beach.

Mr. COX. I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois that that is true; but, as I understand, the minority on this Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MANN. Then they ought not to try to hold us up. I will never consent in the House by unanimous consent to the Democratic side deliberately holding up the Republican side of the House in reference to debate, inasmuch as we never attempt to do that to the Democratic side.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, there is no disposition on my part at all to control any of the time. It is utterly immaterial to me. I am entirely willing for the Speaker to control it. I do not care anything about this debate one way or the other. I do not think there is anything in the contention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE], but if it will do him any good at all, I will give to him and his side one hour that comes to me and any other Republican one-half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. I said of the time to be allotted to the majority on the bill I am willing to give one hour of it to the Democrats and Republicans that oppose the bill. I know there is nothing in the position these gentlemen have taken, I do not care how much they debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the last part of it.

Mr. MOON. I would give the majority of the House two hours and give the other four hours to the other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will restate the request of the gentleman from Tennessee. His request is that general debate be limited to not exceed six hours; that he control one-half, and will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] and others opposed to the bill one hour of that time, and the gentleman from Minnesota is to control three hours. Is that stated right?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire, as the gentleman on the other side says, to hold up the business of the House, but I contend I have no right, Mr. Speaker, to go to the majority party or the majority of the committee and ask for time on a bill that I am opposing. My time must come out of the side at least——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about the practice of the House. For 20 years it has been the practice of the House on appropriation bills, as a rule, to divide the time equally between the two political sides of the House, and invariably over here gentlemen who have charge of the bill have recognized those both for and against the proposition, yielding them time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he is willing to yield one-half hour of his time to the minority Members who have reported against this bill with me?

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Minnesota say?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not want to make any agreement in advance, but I will bear it in mind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts is fair. I understand that about four or five members of the committee have joined in a minority report with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] opposed to certain provisions in the bill. And, consequently, they would be entitled to the time from the gentleman on the other side.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I will say, with his permission, that the minority report on that item was made by myself, and I am in entire harmony with these dissenting Democrats, but I do not want to have them think that because I am their friend they can curtail my privileges in the control of the time allotted to the minority.

Mr. SABATH. Why don't you show your friendship by yielding to them such amount of time as they need?

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Illinois was not on the floor and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] seems to doubt that I would be fair with them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department, in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For gas, electric power and light, and the repair of machinery, United States Post Office Department equipment shops building, $4,500.

For salaries of post-office inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $3,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $2,400 each; 20 inspectors, at $2,250 each; 32 inspectors, at $2,100 each (an increase of 2 submitted in lieu of 2 assistant superintendents, Railway Mail Service, at $2,350 each; to be transferred from the office of the Second Assistant): 20 inspectors, at $2,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $1,900 each; 90 inspectors, at $1,800 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,700 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,600 each; and 65 inspectors, at $1,500 each; in all, $783,700.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee has not asked for recognition.

Mr. MOON. No; I did not ask for recognition.

Mr. TAGUE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Chairman how much time I have?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one hour under the rules of the House.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONRY] 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman the disposition of that hour?

The CHAIRMAN. He has. Under the general rules of the House, when a Member is recognized, he is entitled to one hour, and under the rules of the House under general debate he has the right to use it or yield it as he sees fit.

Mr. MOON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONRY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Chairman, the report issued by the Postmaster General, under date of December 9, 1916, sets forth that the pneumatic-tube service in New York City is to be curtailed by the discontinuance of that service between the general post office in Brooklyn and the postal station located at the railroad terminal of the Long Island division of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Atlantic Avenue and Fourth Avenue, a distance of 1.35 miles. That report also contains a recommendation that the pneumatic-tube service from all stations in Manhattan located south of Forty-fifth Street and Lexington Avenue, on the east side of the town, and at Thirty-ninth Street near Eighth Avenue, on the west side of the town, shall be accorded this service, while stations both east and west to the north of these points will be accorded this service only on condition that the contractor is willing to operate this section of the system at a greatly reduced rental to the Government.

This report also states that no contracts will be entered into by the Postmaster General unless they contain a clause giving him the right to discontinue any and all service upon six months' notice. He undoubtedly expected that his recommendations would excite powerful protests from the business interests of Greater New York when he expressed the view that an insidious lobby might become active, enlisting as "its spokesmen well-meaning but ill-informed citizens, who, believing that they are acting in the interests of better postal service, will bring directly or indirectly every influence possible to perpetuate this incubus."

As a Representative from the city of New York, it seems very strange to me that the Postmaster General should attempt by a remark of this kind to stifle the expression of public opinion whether in indorsement of his views or in refutation of the contention which he embodies in his recommendation.

Citizens of New York City, business men of the largest and most progressive city in the world, have emphatically expressed their resentment of these recommendations in a manner which is both forceful and effective. Their activity proves conclusively that they are not misinformed upon this subject; that they know what they want, and how they shall go about the accomplishment of their purpose; that they are fully alive to, and have an intelligent conception of, the importance of the postal service in New York, and this is evidenced by the fact that upon two days' notice representative business men from nearly every commercial organization in the city appeared before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in protest against the proposed curtailment of the postal facilities of their city. And since the day of that hearing, December 14 last, these business men, awake to the dangers confronting them, have through the medium of their business organizations analyzed the postal conditions of the city and found good reason for indorsing their postmaster in his urgent recommendation that there be no discontinuance of the pneumatic-tube service at any point, but, on the contrary, that the service should be extended to include other sections of the rapidly growing and industrial community.

These business men realize that the congested condition in the traffic of New York City renders surface transportation almost impossible at the present time, even though $400,000,000 have been expended by the city of New York in the construction of subways for the transportation of the people in all the boroughs except that of Richmond, located in the lower harbor of New York.

And I would like to state, in this connection, that of the business men who have taken an interest in this proposition over 95 per cent are automobile owners and operators, and they have learned by their experience in the working of these machines the great difficulties which the congested streets of New York, from the Battery to One hundred and sixty-third Street, force upon any surface method of transportation; and as a result of this experience, and with a knowledge of the transportation facilities that obtain in our city, both above and beneath the ground, these men realize that the pneumatic-tube service must not be curtailed. They realize further that there is no comparison between the working of the pneumatic tube in the transportation of the mails and the proposed system of transportation of first-class mail matter on the surface of the street by vehicular agencies. They understand, as a result of an experience of almost 20 years, that because of the presence of the pneumatic-tube service within the postal districts of New York and Brooklyn that their mails from the country merchants and the country banker are expedited from the terminals to their respective offices. And when we take into consideration that 383 trains containing mail matter arrive at the numerous railway terminals serving the city of New York daily we can readily understand the great difficulties and the manifold delays which will tend to encumber and to interfere with the dispatch of the ordinary business of the city in case the pneumatic service is curtailed. It is not surprising, then, that they should protest against the proposed policy of curtailment recommended by the postal authorities, and their protest is as much in the interests of the country merchant and the country banker, with whom they are in constant communication through the agencies of the Postal Service, as in the interests of the city merchant and the city banker. Their protest is supported by official authority, by the contention of no less distinguished authority than Hon. Charles Emory Smith, who, as Postmaster General of the United States in discussing the merits of the pneumatic-tube service in 1901, said:

> In the great cities pneumatic-tube service is too important and vital an agency of postal expedition to be abandoned. It is an instrumentality which, within reasonable limitations, has come to stay as a part of the modern system of communication. It can no more be discarded than the fast mail trains. To strain every nerve to save a half hour or one hour on the railroad and then to waste a half hour which might easily be saved at the point of departure or destination would be incongruous and unwise. The fast mail train is employed only where the conditions justify it. I say that the pneumatic-tube service is to be used only where in sound reason the importance and value of the return warrant it.

And the business men of New York, in their wise judgment and experience, believe that any improved method for the handling of mail matter is justifiable, is warrantable, and in the end pays for itself by increasing the earnings of the Post Office Department. These business men in dealing with increased demands of business necessitating rapid intercommunication know that in the mail issued from their respective places of business for delivery within the city pneumatic mail-tube service affords them a speedy and thoroughly efficient means of transportation, which insures replies to their communications within three or, at the outside, four hours of their initial mailing.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONRY. I do.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know what proportion of the whole mail is carried through the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. CONRY. I could not say what proportion.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know what class is carried?

Mr. CONRY. First class.

Mr. MOON. Yes. What proportion of the first class goes through the tubes?

Mr. CONRY. I can not say the exact proportion.

Mr. MOON. Is it not a fact that it is about 12 per cent?

Mr. CONRY. I could not say the exact amount. I am perfectly candid with the gentleman. I am simply discussing the salient features of this proposition. If I had more time I would go into it more fully.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know how much it costs per mile to carry the mail?

Mr. CONRY. No; but I do know that the Post Office Department, through the transportation of the first-class mail, says there is an earning of many million a year, an earning of $20,000 a day, and that income produced by the transportation of first-class mail is, in the estimation of business men, sufficient to justify the perpetuation of this system.

Mr. MOON. Well, the gentleman is not informed on the question I asked him about. Is it $17,000 a mile?

Mr. CONRY. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Now, in New York the mail can be carried a little quicker through the pneumatic tubes than it can be carried by automobile, owing to the congested state of the streets, can it not?

Mr. CONRY. A little quicker, yes; a great deal.

Mr. MOON. Therefore the committee has not reported against the continuation of the tube in New York.

Mr. CONRY. But the Postmaster General has recommended in his report a curtailment of an integral part of that service.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. CONRY. The abolition of which would interfere with the efficacy of the entire service. And if the gentleman will permit me to proceed, I will discuss the financial phases of the situation.

Mr. MOON. There is nothing in the bill to do that. I will ask the gentleman this much: Is there any other appropriation in the bill that would be applicable to New York City?

Mr. CONRY. There is a specific impairment recommended by the Postmaster General, against which I am protesting in my speech, and against which the business community in New York City is very forcibly protesting. According to the records of the Post Office Department about 1,000,000 first-class letters are mailed within the postal district of New York for delivery within that district daily. This enormous dispatch of first-class mail produces a revenue of $20,000 per day, and from that revenue it is only fair and reasonable that an expeditious service should be maintained to serve and advance the business of such a progressive community. Commenting upon the cost of this service, the Postmaster General of the United States, in a communication addressed to the Speaker of this House, dated February 4, 1901, said:

> While the cost is great—

The rate in New York City at that time was $48,000 per mile per annum for the service then in operation—> the demonstratable advantage is proportionately greater. Besides, there are good reasons for believing that its maintenance and moderate extension in the large cities will stimulate an increased business and will pay for its cost.

Business men who control the manufacturing establishments of the country and who have adopted every modern device for the promotion of increased efficiency, and looking to the increased output of production would not, in my opinion, deem it wise or profitable to return to the service or method of production based upon principles of industry that obtained 20 years ago. Such would not be good business policy and would not be consistent with good business judgment. Neither would it pay nor lead to the development of improved marketable conditions. It therefore does not seem good business judgment in the view of the business men of New York City to discontinue the pneumatic-tube service, which is rendered so necessary by existing business conditions, and to return to the surface method for the transportation of mail matter.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONRY. Yes; I will.

Mr. GALLAGHER. What do you say as to the statement of the postmaster at Chicago, who says that these pneumatic tubes are "no good"?

Mr. CONRY. Well, I would not like to characterize a statement of that character coming from a gentleman occupying such a distinguished position.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That was the statement made before the committee.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONRY. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I would like to say that the postmaster at St. Louis, where we have these pneumatic tubes, has written a letter in which he says that they are very valuable and that there will be nothing found that can take their place and give the service that we now have.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONRY. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Did not the postmaster at New York, who has been in the service of the United States Post Office Department for about 45 years, unqualifiedly indorse the pneumatic-tube service in New York and emphasize its necessity?

Mr. CONRY. Yes. It would be like discontinuing the fast trains and return to the method of transportation in vogue when the prairie was an undiscovered field and the oxen and prairie schooner were the commodious, though inconvenient, method of passing from one outpost of civilization to another. The pneumatic-tube service in its entirety in New York City is just as essential to the success of the business men of New York City and the Post Office Department of the United States as are the fast-moving trains connecting the Metropolis with the seaports on the Pacific coast.

The Postmaster General says that this service is expensive. Is it? Has he stopped to analyze its cost? Has he considered for a moment the method by which he is comparing the pneumatic-tube service with the automobile service. He says that it is purely a matter of expense, whereas the business people of New York say that it is a matter of service, not expense. To assume that his premise is correct, what does this pneumatic-tube service cost? Let us see. When the service was first installed in the city of New York, connecting the Produce Exchange with the general post office, and the general post office with stations D, Madison Square, F, and H (now called the Grand Central Terminal), 4.2 miles, the Post Office Department paid the contractors $158,000 per annum, or at the rate of $38,000 per mile per annum. The service then was worth every penny paid for it. The streets of New York, even then as now, were very congested, and the sections of the city served by the pneumatic tube were densely populated and so heavily encumbered with factories and other productive enterprises that the revenue of the Post Office Department from that district alone was increased within the period of four years approximately 40 per cent.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONRY. Yes.

Mr. MOON. What time was the gentleman speaking of?

Mr. CONRY. The time of the establishment of the system—in 1897.

Mr. MOON. That was the one that was abolished afterwards?

Mr. CONRY. Yes.

Mr. MOON. You recollect the history of the fraud that abolished that?

Mr. CONRY. No; I have no recollection of it, but I do recollect the history of the frauds connected with the operation of the automobile system, and the condition of transportation that occurred in the city of New York three years ago, in consequence of which certain gentlemen connected with those frauds were imprisoned, and certain people connected with the frauds were fined, I believe, $50,000.

Mr. MOON. That was a very proper thing to do. May I ask the gentleman if he recollects that other transaction?

Mr. CONRY. No; I do not recollect that.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONRY. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Has the gentleman information of what fines were imposed on the pneumatic-tube people by reason of the thefts that were committed in that service?

Mr. CONRY. No; I have not. I am not discussing that situation. I am simply discussing the economic efficiency of this instrumentality for the transmission of the mails.

On April 21, 1902, Congress enacted a law covering the issuance of contracts for service of this character and provided that—

> No contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double line of tubes which shall involve an expenditure in cost of $17,000 per mile per annum, and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

This price was not imposed upon the Government by the contractor, but upon the contractor by the Government, and under the terms of the act of 1902 the contractor has increased the service by direction of the Postmaster General from 4.2 to approximately 27 miles in New York City, and now he is told that the system constructed by direction of the Post Office Department must be cut in two, and that he must take less money for one half than he can secure from the Post Office Department for the other half.

This is a stern condition. Taking the most charitable view of such a burden imposed by the Government, to say the least, it lacks the elements of equity and possesses for the contractor a stern necessity which he is compelled to assume or deliberately abandon his business. The existing rate of pay under the contract is $17,000 per mile per annum, $45.48 per mile per day, or $2.32 per mile per hour; and, as it is possible to transmit or dispatch a carrier on 10 seconds' headway in both directions, because the line is of double construction in New York City, the Post Office Department may secure 720 carrier dispatches per hour, and the rate per carrier dispatch is about three-tenths of a cent per hour. That does not seem extravagantly expensive in comparison with the cost of automobile service. Its availability, its continuity of service, the fact that it is accessible for use every moment of every period of the day, takes it out of the realm of comparison with the surface transportation scheme and proves conclusively that the automobile is scarcely its competitor. Under the present contract for mail transportation by means of motor vehicles in the city of New York the Post Office Department is paying approximately 60 cents per mile. Now, the automobile operating on a schedule of 30 minutes' headway is only available twice in an hour. Two automobiles are there required, we will say, for a mile circuit. That means four automobiles per hour, or $2.40 per hour for a vehicular service only available four times every 60 minutes, when the conditions of street congestion do not interrupt its adherence to schedule.

And the Post Office Department contends that automobile service will meet the requirements of the New York postal district in the rapid handling of mail; would have us to believe and to be credulous enough to consider that they can do with automobiles what we know it has been able to do through the instrumentality of the present pneumatic-tube service.

The Postmaster General in his report states that the interruptions to pneumatic-tube service are frequent. He, however, has not told us in his report, nor does it appear in the report of the departmental commission appointed by him, how much money has been exacted as fines from the contractor for the pneumatic-tube service during the past two years. I have been informed by reliable authority that in the two or three years last past, the pneumatic-tube contractor has been fined approximately $100 for failure in service, and these failures cover a wide range, viz, delays, interruptions, soiling of mail matter, and delinquencies on the part of the employees of the contractor. The department, which bears the burden and which under the law has the right to exact fines from any earnings accruing to the contractor, has only imposed fines upon him in the sum of approximately $50 per year. Under the terms of the contract the contractor earns about $500,000 per year, and is fined only $50 out of that possible earning capacity. Under this showing there can not be any substantial weight given to the contention that this service has inflicted injury upon the Government by reason of interruptions of service, but, on the contrary, it was stated by the postmaster at New York, who appeared before the committee, that "the number of train connections missed and consequent delay to the mails during December, 1915, January, February, and March, 1916, due to irregularities in mail-wagon—auto—service occasioned by snowstorms and resultant congested and slippery streets was 209," or an average of more than 50 trains missed per month, notwithstanding the fact that the mails closed 30 minutes earlier in order to allow that additional leeway.

During the nearly two decades of the existence of the tube service in New York City the postal business of the city has increased from $8,154,000 to $33,518,250. This growth and development has been largely due to the improvement of the system which it is now proposed to curtail. The postal business of New York City to-day nets a surplus revenue of $20,000,000 to the Post Office Department, which should justify a policy based upon sound business principles of extension rather than curtailment of such an efficient system.

Business expediency alone, if no other consideration were involved, should dictate the advisability of continuing pneumatic mail tube contracts as they apply to Greater New York, on a scope of service no less restricted than is found in existing facilities, and on such terms as may insure to this highly concentrated postal district the best available instrumentalities for the reduction of congestion, maintaining speed of transmission, and continuing the capacity of the New York post office to render satisfactory service to the business interests of the community.

The congestion of New York to-day has reached the utmost limit of the capacity of its thoroughfares for business transportation. Vehicular traffic in motor cars alone has increased from 102,000 in the year of 1915 to 140,000 in the year of 1916, an increase of 38,000 in one year. This enormous increase has exacted an appalling toll of one human life every 14 hours, and the maiming and injury of one unfortunate every 23 minutes of the 24 hours of every day in the year. This condition is startling in its significance.

We have to-day the most efficient traffic squad and the most perfect traffic regulations of any city in the world, and yet in spite of improved methods of traffic regulation, as population and business increases, the streets of New York are becoming more and more steadily congested. In view of the difficulty in enforcing traffic regulation as to motor trucks carrying United States mails, which has been testified to by the chief of the traffic squad at the hearing before the committee, it would be most unfortunate if a considerable number of mail trucks not now required for the postal service of New York, because of existing tubes, were added to the large number that already encumber our streets. Every consideration of business expediency, every wise precaution for human safety, every element of wisdom involved in the establishment of a sound business policy, demands that the present pneumatic-tube system of the city of Greater New York be continued and perpetuated in its present condition of proved efficiency. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the full Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads held open sessions on December 11, 12, 13, and 14, at which a full opportunity was offered to all who desired to be heard in reference to the pneumatic-tube mail service. At those hearings a number of gentlemen representing various business organizations in the several cities where the pneumatic tubes are now in use appeared and made statements, as did officers of the tube companies, and the First Assistant Postmaster General, who was a member of the commission upon whose report the recommendation of the Postmaster General was based.

The two questions upon which the committee desired and sought information were:

First. Do the tubes materially expedite the delivery of the mails? and Second. Does the better service of the tubes justify its larger cost?

That the tubes do expedite the mail we do not consider any longer an open question. In the beginning many intelligent men doubted the feasibility of those tubes, and to determine that question the act of June 2, 1900, directed the appointment of a commission. In a report to Congress made under date of January 4, 1901, the Postmaster General said:

The reports of these several local and general committees are herewith submitted to Congress, and they are commended to consideration as embracing a large volume of valuable information for the guidance of the legislative branch of the Government in acting on this subject. Attention is specially directed to the report of the second and final general committee, which was selected with great care with a view of securing an efficient representation of the best business, mechanical, and professional knowledge and experience. The chairman, Mr. Theodore C. Search, has for many years been president of the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States. Prof. Robert H. Thurston is director of Sibley College, Cornell University, first assistant engineer, United States Navy, and formerly professor of mechanical engineering of Stevens Institute of Technology. Mr. S. Cristy Mead is assistant secretary of the Merchants' Association of New York, and especially recommended by that body. Mr. Alfred Brooks Fry is chief engineer and superintendent of repairs of United States public buildings, and Messrs. William T. Manning, Frederick A. Halsey, and Lyman E. Cooley are widely known as eminent consulting and mechanical engineers.

The report of this committee presents an intelligent and comprehensive answer to the inquiries embodied in the provision of Congress for the investigation. It reviews the exhibits and conclusions of the joint local committees and the first general committee representing the department, and subjects their recommendations to the best tests of reasonable conditions and requirements which experience and practical wisdom can apply. It considers the feasibility and utility of the pneumatic-tube service as a permanent feature of the Postal System, the conditions which should govern its maintenance and extension, the proper relation of cost to postal receipts, the ratio of expenditure which would be disproportionate to the benefits, the principles which should govern rental from private companies, the advantages of Government ownership and the conditions under which it would be admissible and expedient.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMISSION OF 1900.

(1) This committee finds the pneumatic method of mail transportation a novel, a valuable, and a mechanically successful system, ingeniously elaborated, and practically adapted in an admirable manner to the purposes of the Post Office Department.

(2) The committee finds the system of immense advantage to the business interests of the country in its facilitation of mail transmission, both locally and generally, throughout the United States.

(3) The cost of this advance in postal methods is found to be necessarily large, but yet to be productive of more than proportional advantage in the large cities.

(4) The Government, through its responsible officials, should be the final judge of the extent of ultimate adoption.

(5) The committee advises the retention of all existing plants, and would recommend extensions in a limited number of cases, as specified in the body of this report.

(6) The cost of the pneumatic service is believed to be capable of some reduction, and of very considerable reduction with the further progress of improvement.

(7) It is recommended that the contracts hereafter made should be based upon proposals including exact specifications in detail with all required maps and plans, and capable of precise verification by the expert advisers of the Government.

(8) Ownership by the Government is considered desirable whenever the systems adopted have passed the experimental stage.

(9) A correct system of estimation of a proper rental is advised, and an illustration of such a method is given.

(10) Leasing is admissible under special conditions, described in a general way in the body of this report.

(11) Systems adopted should be as far as practicable standardized, and in operation interchangeability of mail packages therein should be secured.

(12) The system of rental on the basis of a stated percentage of construction cost is condemned.

(13) The Post Office Department should be given precedence in assignment of space in the United States public building where post offices are located, when such space is needed for essential machinery and apparatus and their accessories.

(14) Certain general principles, as specified in this report, should be adopted and adhered to in the decision of questions bearing upon the introduction of such improvements as are here discussed, and in extension and further improvements.

A second commission was appointed in 1905, and its recommendations to the Postmaster General were as follows:

It is not to be expected that a tube in any city can be employed at its full capacity the entire contract time. If the amount of mail to be handled occupied as much as 10 per cent of the capacity of the tube during the dull hours of the day, say, up to 3 p. m., the tube could not, under general conditions, handle all the mail during the "rush" hours of the business day. It is believed that when the amount of first-class mail to be handled would require more than one-half of an hour to transmit at full capacity of tube, being more than 81,000 letters to be transmitted, the transmission of such an amount, together with special-delivery letters, registered mail, and second, third, and fourth class matter, would employ the tube a reasonable per cent of the time. Where there is any such quantity of mail to be transmitted and the frequency of deliveries and collections, the number of trains, and the saving of time in transit by tube, each dispatch indicates advance to such a considerable quantity of mail, the expenditure on account of tube service is thought to be justifiable and advisable. At that rate the cost for each piece transmitted would be less than seven-tenths of a mill a mile.

In the cities of the largest class the pneumatic-tube service can not be considered as an overexpensive service in the light of its capacity to carry a large quantity of mail and the saving of time in transit and general advance in delivery of incoming and outgoing mails. Its advantages are not confined to the people of the cities wherein it is installed in the way of advanced delivery of their mail, but are shared by the people of the whole country in the earlier receipt of mail from the great business centers of the country. A system that advances mail by an earlier train than it could otherwise be dispatched by secures to addressees the benefit of its receipt several hours or, in some cases, days earlier than by other methods. The business of the whole country is interested in and benefited by the speedy, safe, and uninterrupted transportation of mail in the great business centers of the country. Pneumatic-tube service in the largest cities can not be considered a local service, since its benefits are directly or indirectly shared by the whole country.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 4, 1905.

A third commission was authorized by the act of May 27, 1908, and its report to the Postmaster General, which was transmitted by him to Congress, under date of December 15, 1908, with his approval, announced the following conclusions:

(1) The pneumatic-tube service is a very important auxiliary for the rapid transportation of first-class mail in the most important cities, and performs a function not at present obtainable by other means.

(2) Its constant availability makes it particularly appropriate for special-delivery mail; for all first-class mail of local origin for local delivery; for supplementary closings of first-class mail for dispatch by train; and for advance dispatches of first-class mail from trains for city delivery.

(3) When established, it should also be employed, as far as possible and economically, for the transportation of other mail.

(4) Registered mail should be sent by tube whenever security and celerity can be combined in practice.

(5) Mechanically the tube service appears to be still in an experimental condition, although considerable progress has been made toward the development of a fixed standard of machinery.

(6) With the above reservation, the regularity and efficiency of the tube service is commendable.

(7) As the present contracts call for the installation of 64⅓ miles of tube lines and as only 42½ miles are at present in operation, the tube companies should be required to complete their contracts without undue delay, in order that the effect of full and complete systems toward increasing the special-delivery and other first-class mail may be ascertained by the department from actual experience.

(8) The present contracts under which the tube companies are performing mail service will not expire until June 30, 1916—almost eight years hence. During that period there should be ample opportunity for the companies to perfect the systems and for the Post Office Department to observe the effect upon the Postal Service. Further, during that period it is possible that other methods of transportation will be developed or improved so as to change entirely the outlook as it now appears. Five or six years hence, we believe, it will be advisable to renew the consideration of the question of Government ownership.

(9) In view of the foregoing we consider it appropriate to advise you that, in our opinion, it is not feasible and desirable at the present time for the Government to purchase, to install, or to operate the pneumatic tubes, and this is our unanimous judgment.

The committee of 1900 described the pneumatic-tube service as an expensive service, and it appears to be so unless one bears in mind the great frequency of tube-carrier trips, which are made 4 per minute, or 240 per hour (as a minimum). Remembering that the service costs $17,000 per mile per annum, or $8,500 one way, the rate per day per mile is about $25. We must bear in mind, however, that the hours of service are in most cases 20 hours per day thus providing 4,800 carriers' trips through the tube. This represents a cost of only one-half cent per carrier per mile, or one-half cent in transmitting about 450 letters 1 mile. Even on sections of the tube where the service is used for only a small percentage of its capacity, as between stations J and C in Philadelphia, the cost is nevertheless slight. For example, on this section, where only 392 carriers are dispatched both ways daily, with an average of 200 pieces for each carrier, the cost would be 12 cents per carrier mile, or a charge of only about one-half a mill per letter per mile. The constant availability of the tube service for dispatches of mail at any time is a very valuable factor toward maintaining an even circulation of mail and as assisting toward the even employment of the working force. This desirable advantage could hardly be secured by any other method.

The extreme expectations in regard to the capacity of tube service for transmitting first-class mail have not been realized. In this respect the operating companies have also learned by experience that safety of operation requires a greater headway or interval between successive carriers through the tube than was at first thought necessary. In 1897 the interval between carriers was assumed to be 6 seconds, whereas to-day it varies from 13 to 15 seconds. It is said by the American Pneumatic Service Co. that by improved methods a system could be built by which carriers could be dispatched on a headway of from four and one-half to seven seconds, or approximately twice as fast as the present service. To do this, however, would require a different type of terminal apparatus, larger power plants, and considerable more labor. In early calculations the capacity of the tube carrier was rated as 600 letters. It is possible to place 600 letters in one of the tube carriers, but in actual practice this committee has deemed it best to fix the maximum at 450 pieces, thus approving the ratio accepted by the departmental committee of 1905 in making pneumatic-tube investigation. As a result of these several modifications our estimate of the tube capacity one way per hour is now 108,000 pieces instead of 360,000 pieces as was predicted in 1897.

PNEUMATIC TUBE COMMISSION.

(Daniel A. Campbell, postmaster, Chicago, Ill.; George H. Roberts, postmaster, Brooklyn, N. Y.; E. C. Mansfield, postmaster, Boston, Mass.; Frank Wyman, postmaster, St. Louis, Mo.; Joseph Stewart, Second Assistant Postmaster General; V. J. Bradley, Superintendent Railway Mail Service; E. M. Norris, assistant superintendent; J. M. Masten, Assistant Superintendent Railway Mail Service.)

It will be observed that the foregoing report declares that "the extreme expectations in regard to the pneumatic-tube service for transmitting first-class mail have not been realized," and states that while it was assumed in 1897 that the interval between carriers would be 6 seconds, it then varied from 13 to 15 seconds. We take it for granted that it was from this report that the commission, whose recommendations we now have under consideration, took its statement that the tube containers can only be dispatched at the rate of one every 15 seconds. That report also states, however, that the tube company then claimed that by certain changes in the type of the terminal apparatus and an enlargement of the power plant the containers could be dispatched very much more rapidly.

The improvements which the tube company then claimed could be made have been made, and the containers can now be dispatched at the rate of more than 7 per minute, as was demonstrated by an actual test made very recently in Boston. In Philadelphia, Pa., on December 27, a committee of business men from different organizations visited the post-office stations on an inspection of the tube service, accompanied by Congressmen J. HAMPTON MOORE, GEORGE W. EDMONDS, and GEORGE P. DARROW and two post-office superintendents. At North Philadelphia station these visitors witnessed the arrival of 10 carriers with mail in 83 seconds, an average of one every 8.3 seconds, or more than 7 per minute, and the carriers contained an average of more than 8 pounds, or over 400 letters each, which means that 61 pounds of mail per minute, or 183,000 letters per hour, were carried by the tubes.

These several reports so completely established the value of these tubes as a method of expediting the mail that Congress then took up the question of their purchase and operation by the Government. The act of August 24, 1912, provided for the appointment of a "commission consisting of two members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, United States Senate, and two members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives, to be appointed by the chairmen of the respective committees, and the Second Assistant Postmaster General." That commission was "authorized to investigate the feasibility and desirability of the Government purchasing and operating the equipment for pneumatic-tube service in the cities in which such service is now installed, together with rights to operate and extend equipment in such cities and elsewhere, and to ascertain the cost at which such purchase may be made."

After a patient and thorough investigation the chairman of that committee, Senator HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, and the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Hon. Joseph Stewart, made a report to Congress, in which they stated the following conclusions:

In view of the testimony and reports submitted and set forth in the hearings before the joint commission to investigate the pneumatic-tube postal system and the foregoing recited facts we reach the following conclusions:

The pneumatic-tube service for the transmission of mails in the cities in which such service is now installed is a valuable adjunct to the mail transportation service for handling first class, registered, and special-delivery mails not furnished by other means of transportation, and is justified by the advantages of availability, expedition, security, and reliability.

The Postal Service and the patrons of the mails have become adjusted to this mail facility through use during the contract periods, and its considerable withdrawal or discontinuance would be regarded as an inadvisable curtailment of facilities. The present contracts expire June 30, 1916.

The tubes as now used have been for the most part laid under contracts with the Government solely for postal purposes, and if the mail service by them were discontinued there is little use to which they could be put for commercial purposes, and that only by extensive changes of terminals and relocation of supplemental lines and the terminal machinery.

Under Government ownership and operation of the tubes and equipment important advantages would accrue. The necessity for financing an enterprise attended with a certain amount of risk with the consequent cost for the hazard—ultimately paid by the Government in the contract price of service—would be obviated. Difficulties in obtaining franchises would not exist. Extensions of lines where justified would be possible at reduced cost and depending only upon the judgment of the officers of the Post Office Department and the action of Congress. The location of postal stations and the maintenance or construction of tube lines to supply them would be coordinated, thus resulting in fewer changes in line locations and abandonment of constructed lines and consequent loss. The Government would maintain and operate the tubes at a annual cost much less than it is paying under contracts for the service because it would be relieved of interest at commercial rates on bonded debts, insurance charges, taxes, dividends on stock or return on investment, and certain other expenses, such as salaries, rent, light, heat, and legal services, now obligations upon the contracting companies. The contract cost of the service for the fiscal year 1912 was $929,460.30. It is estimated that under Government ownership and operation the cost would be approximately $462,596.02 per annum, a saving of $466,864.28 per annum, which would repay the first cost in 10.87 years if purchase be made at the estimated minimum value of $5,078,560.21. If 2½ per cent be allowed upon such purchase value the first cost would be repaid in about 12.95 years.

HOKE SMITH (Chairman).
JOSEPH STEWART.

The Hon. FREDERICK L. BLACKMON, of the House, filed what has been denominated a minority report, though he does not assert anywhere in it that the tubes do not expedite the mail. He opposes the Government's purchase and operation of the tubes, and indicates his opinion that $17,000 is an excessive annual rental for their use. Inasmuch, however, as Mr. BLACKMON'S report is brief, we reproduce it in order that each Member of the House may interpret it for himself. It is as follows:

Mr. BLACKMON, of Alabama, one of the members of the Pneumatic Tube Commission appointed under the authority conferred on the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, approved August 24, 1912, submits the following as his conclusions as derived from the testimony, hearing, and investigations of the pneumatic-tube system which is now being leased by the Federal Government and operated in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis:

I agree that the testimony taken and the figures submitted by the engineers and auditors employed by the commission are correctly reported in the report, but I can not agree to recommend to Congress a purchase of these tubes. My reasons are these:

First. I do not believe that the Government can operate a pneumatic-tube system as cheaply as can private individuals.

Secondly. I am not convinced that there exists a necessity for the operation of fifty-odd miles of 8-inch pneumatic tubes.

Third. If the necessity exists for the use of pneumatic tubes, the present tubes have not the capacity to keep pace with the increase in mail matter that is bound to come from a perfection of our parcel-post system.

Fourth. A careful examination of all the testimony and facts submitted leads me to believe that the Government can take care of this class of mail by contract, using screen wagons and automobiles, more cheaply than it can be handled by any system of pneumatic tubes.

I am not prepared to say that the $17,000 per mile paid for the service now being handled by the use of the pneumatic-tube system is excessive, but I am convinced that there is not sufficient mail handled through these tubes to warrant the Government in paying $17,000 per mile for the service.

In view of the foregoing conclusions reached by me, I can not join in recommending to Congress a purchase of these tubes.

Respectfully submitted.

FRED L. BLACKMON.

Mr. Murdock, of Kansas, the other member of the commission representing the House, filed his views, which, while opposing the governmental purchase of the tubes, admit the value of their service and favors their discontinuance only where their use, as he understands it, is not equal to a fair percentage of their capacity. Mr. Murdock concludes his views as follows:

The actual advantage of the tubes is the acceleration of dispatch of a certain portion of the mails. There can be added to this advantage, warrantably, the fact that the tubes are available at all times and are not subject to the delays from weather conditions which occasionally block surface transportation.

The pneumatic-tube service therefore, in my view, is a defensible auxiliary for the rapid transportation of mails in those areas of mail receipt and dispatch where the volume of mail utilizes a considerable capacity of the tubes, and it is not defensible as an auxiliary for that purpose in areas of mail where the volume of mail utilizes an inconsiderable capacity of the tubes.

In those areas of heavy mails where it is defensible the tube service is still in an experimental condition and is, in my opinion, only in the earlier stages of capacity development.

CONCLUSIONS.

In view of these facts I have reached the following conclusions:

It is not desirable that the Government purchase and operate the equipment for pneumatic-tube postal service which is now installed in various cities.

It is desirable, as it would be just and economical administration, to refuse to renew all contracts for service where less than 10 per cent of the capacity of the tube is utilized.

VICTOR MURDOCK.

Thus this question stood when, on the 17th day of July, 1915, the Postmaster General, without being specially authorized by any law to do so, except so far as new service was to be passed upon, appointed certain officers and employees of the Post Office Department to investigate and report as to the needs and practicability of the pneumatic-tube service, and so forth.

Ordinarily we would be disposed to receive the report of any commission appointed by a Cabinet officer of this Government as entitled to the greatest weight, but the bias of this particular commission is made so manifest in its report, and was likewise made so manifest by the statements of the First Assistant Postmaster General before the committee, that we can not consider it as other than an intensely partisan presentation of the question. That commission entered upon its work either under instruction or else with a determination in its own mind to report in favor of abolishing the tube service; and we base this opinion upon the fact that immediately following the announcement of its personnel the Philadelphia Inquirer printed a story from its Washington correspondent accurately forecasting the report of the commission. Besides the circumstance to which we have just alluded, the First Assistant Postmaster General, when asked before the committee whether he would have made the same report if he had known that some of his statements of fact were erroneous, refused to make a direct answer to the question, thus impressing upon our minds a belief that, though the facts were not as the commission reported them, its recommendations would nevertheless have been the same.

THE COMMISSION'S REPORT.

That report states 12 "principal limitations and disadvantages of pneumatic tubes for the transportation of mail," of which only the first 2 are controlling; and we respectfully submit that they are both based upon a gross misapprehension of the facts, as will appear from the following statement.

The report of the commission states that the capacity of the containers is limited to 5 pounds of mail and that the containers can only be dispatched through the tubes at the rate of four per minute. Upon this statement as to the capacity and dispatch of the containers the entire report of the commission must stand or fall. In refutation of the statement that the capacity of the containers is limited to 5 pounds of mail the officers of the tube companies produced before the committee one of the containers, which they filled with letters of the usual size and, after filling it, took out the contents and weighed it in the presence of the full committee. That operation demonstrated that the capacity of the containers, so far from being limited to 5 pounds, is 15 pounds. The 15 pounds, however, required a container to be closely packed, and we think it fair to consider the contents at 10 pounds, for it was obvious to every man who witnessed the demonstration that the container would carry 10 pounds without the slightest effort to pack it. That estimate, too, corresponds with the report made by the commission of 1908.

There was, of course, no opportunity to demonstrate in the open session of the committee how frequently the containers could be dispatched through the tube, but I took it upon myself to go to the city of Boston and satisfied myself on that question by a test conducted by the post office there through its superintendent of the mails. In the presence of a large number of newspaper reporters we had the matter thoroughly tested, with the result that six containers were easily dispatched every minute, and the official demonstration made for a committee of Philadelphia business men, to which we have already referred, confirms the claim that more than six containers can be dispatched every minute.

It is therefore absolutely certain that in estimating the capacity of the containers at 5 pounds and the dispatch of the containers at four per minute the postal commission subtracted 66⅔ per cent from the actual capacity of the tubes. The postal commission estimates that four containers, each containing 5 pounds of mail, can be dispatched every minute, which limits the capacity of the tubes to 20 pounds of mail per minute, while the physical demonstration shows that six containers, each carrying 10 pounds of mail, can be sent every minute, thus exhibiting a capacity of 60 pounds of mail to the minute, or three times as much as was estimated by the commission.

Having minimized the capacity of the tubes to the extent of 66⅔ per cent, it is not remarkable that the commission would then report that automobiles could deliver the mail as expeditiously as the tubes. It is, however, remarkable that the report in which a discontinuance of the tubes is advised upon the ground that they do not materially expedite the delivery of the mail should be accompanied by tables which show that on a test instituted by the commission itself the tubes expedited on that one day 4,645,771 pieces of mail. It is little short of an insult to the intelligence of Congress for that commission to tell us that the tubes do not expedite the mail, and then attach to their report containing that statement data which show that the tubes delivered over four and a half million letters more promptly than they could have been delivered by any other service.

The statements of the commission with respect to the congestion, and the consequent impediment to automobile service, were contradicted in every instance by Representatives in Congress from the cities having the tube service. We select the city of St. Louis as the smallest of those where the tubes have been installed; and it is fair to suppose that the commission found the least difficulty in ascertaining the facts in regard to that city. The commission states that there is little or no surface congestion in St. Louis, its exact language being:

There is little or no surface congestion in St. Louis, and an automobile or other conveyance is able to travel rapidly.

Against that statement of the commission, the Representatives in the House from the city of St. Louis oppose their most positive statements to the contrary; and Representative DYER declared to the committee that the travel by vehicle is so tedious on account of the congestion that he often walks from his office to the courthouse, even when his automobile is at hand.

Referring again to that part of the commission's report which covers St. Louis, we call attention to this statement:

The committee, however, believe that no material advantage results from the use of the pneumatic-tube service in St. Louis.

And that statement is made in the face of a letter addressed to the commission by the postmaster at St. Louis, in which he says:

Approximately 75 per cent of the mails now forwarded via pneumatic tubes could probably be handled by screen motor wagons without additional cost to the department and with no delay in dispatch or delivery, but the other 25 per cent, which includes important eastern mails for delivery particularly in the down-town sections, as well as dispatches of similar mail made on close connections after deposit in territory adjacent to the tube service, would be very seriously delayed.

Similar statements and contradictions could be cited until this report would be extended to a tedious length, and we therefore forbear to say more in that respect.

Leaving aside what the officers of the tube companies have said as springing from their personal or financial interest, and leaving aside what the postal commission have said as due to their partisan bias, we think that great importance should be attached to what was said by the intelligent and reputable business men who appeared before the committee, representing practically every business organization in the several cities from which they came. Those gentlemen testified that the business men in their respective cities are absolutely unanimous in their demand for a continuance, and even for an extension, of the tube service. We do not think that business men are entitled to any privileges under this Government not extended to all other citizens, but we do think that when these business men assert that a certain service is of great advantage to them, and they are willing to pay all and even much more than it costs the Government to perform that service, they are fairly entitled to have it. Since the Government renders postal service for pay, it ought to give the very best service for which those who patronize its post offices are willing to pay.

The testimony before the committee and the reports of the Post Office Department all show that while the first-class mail—the kind transported through these tubes—constitutes approximately 25 per cent of the entire mail according to weight, it yields approximately 75 per cent of the entire postal revenues. When we consider that this first-class mail not only pays the entire cost of handling it but contributes a very large sum toward paying the cost of all other classes, it would seem too plain for argument that every facility for its dispatch and delivery ought to be provided by the Government; and the cost of expediting it can not fairly be considered an objection so long as it constitutes approximately one-fourth of our mail matter and produces approximately three-fourths of our postal receipts. It is a great mistake to suppose that the only people who are benefited by the expedition of these mails are those who live in the cities where the tubes are in use, because the correspondence of those city merchants, bankers, and manufacturers is in large part with the people of the smaller towns and cities, who thus have their own mail expedited.

But even if these business men who have been using these tubes for years, and who must, therefore, fully understand whether they are an advantage or a disadvantage, are all mistaken in what they have said, and even if we conclude, against the judgment of all who have spoken on the question except the last commission, that the tubes do not expedite the mail, we would still insist that the tube service should not be discontinued in the cities where it has been installed so long as the mail it carries pays the entire expense of handling it, including the rental of the tubes. We say this because we know it is utterly indefensible for the Government of the United States to aggravate the present traffic congestion in these cities by adding the new automobiles which would be required to substitute these tubes. It will not answer us to say that the additional automobiles will be but a very small percentage of those now using the streets, because when the streets are once crowded the addition of a single vehicle may be the means of a serious accident, involving the loss of life or limb. You might add 50 vehicles where only 5 were already employed, and though the increase would be 1,000 per cent it might not result in the slightest congestion. On the other hand, to add 50 vehicles where there were already 5,000, would add only 1 per cent, and yet that 1 per cent might grievously aggravate the congestion.

It is not necessary to argue to those who live in cities or to those who visit our great cities that the wisdom of traffic control lies in a constant diminution of surface traffic. This truth is so palpable that the cities of this country are to-day spending millions and hundreds of millions constructing subways, so that they may take persons from the surface and transport them underground. What shall be thought of its wisdom and its justice if in these same cities which are taking people off of the surface and putting them under the ground, the Federal Government takes articles from underground to transport them on the surface?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that the postmaster at Boston said the pneumatic tubes were no good, generally speaking?

Mr. TAGUE. No; the postmaster at Boston said he was opposed to the tubes as they are at present constituted and arranged. He did say, however, that he would be in favor of the tube system to the city of Cambridge, which is close to the city of Boston.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as the local conditions between the Boston post office and Cambridge were concerned 25 years ago, when it was my good fortune to be at Cambridge, there was no congestion of traffic between Boston proper and Cambridge. Have conditions so changed that there is a congestion of traffic? I should think there would be no difficulty in having expeditious traffic by automobile service from Boston out Commonwealth Avenue, across the Harvard Bridge, and out Massachusetts Avenue to Cambridge Station proper.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, in the last 25 years the city of Cambridge has enlarged and developed greatly, as have the adjacent towns and cities. They are all part of the general postal system of the city of Boston. In other words, they are all substations of the city of Boston, and the amount of mail going in that direction is far greater than the gentleman would imagine, unless he has seen the conditions in later years.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am addressing my inquiry specifically as to the congested condition of traffic on the thoroughfares leading from the Boston post office to the Cambridge station post office.

Mr. TAGUE. The congestion in the city of Boston from the general post office to the bridge leading to Cambridge is just as great as in any other part of the city. It is impossible to drive an automobile through that part of the city at any greater speed than in any other part of the heart of the city of Boston.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course as to the other proposition which the gentleman advances, that the increase of mail makes it necessary to continue the pneumatic-tube service, I take issue with him, because it is a fundamental proposition that all the mail matter which goes from the Boston post office to the Cambridge Station post office can not be carried by pneumatic tube. Some of it must be carried by automobile cars. With the increase of mail traffic naturally more mail will have to be sent by automobile cars, and to have the supplementary means of pneumatic-tube service does not relieve the situation, does not expedite the delivery of the mail, except just a fraction of it.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I will say that I am not advocating any pneumatic-tube service to the city of Cambridge.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman said the postmaster of Boston was in favor of a pneumatic-tube system to Cambridge.

Mr. TAGUE. In a letter sent to the postmaster of Boston by the mayor of the city of Cambridge and by the business men of the city of Cambridge, which letter is in the record, he was asked to put in operation the pneumatic-tube system to the city of Cambridge, and in a letter to the city government of Cambridge he told them he was in favor of a pneumatic tube to the city of Cambridge. I stated that in answer to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] as to whether the postmaster was opposed to pneumatic tubes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the present postmaster of Boston is only in favor of pneumatic tubes for long-distance service. It is conceded by anyone who knows anything about it that they are not serviceable for short circuits—a quarter of a mile or a half mile. If they have any advantage at all, it is for dispatching mail for long distances—4, 5, or 10 miles. The advantage of sending these bullets through the pneumatic tube for short distances is no gain at all.

Mr. TAGUE. I do not agree with the gentleman as to that, and I think that before we are through we will prove that that is not the fact.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the very merit of the pneumatic-tube service that it passes through short distances where the travel is very congested?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Nobody contends that it ought to be established between New York and Chicago, but through such districts where the vehicular traffic is so great as to increase the danger of injury and loss of life.

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that the postmaster of Boston said in a general way that these tubes were no good, but that they might be of advantage between the post office and Cambridge?

Mr. TAGUE. I do not remember any declaration of the postmaster of Boston to that effect.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Something has been said about the charges of the pneumatic-tube company being extortionate and out of all proportion to the value of the service. Does the gentleman know what it cost to install and operate these tubes?

Mr. TAGUE. I will say to the gentleman that I am not here to argue what it is going to cost or what it cost the companies to install them.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman want to know something about it before he forces it on the Government?

Mr. TAGUE. If the gentleman will be calm, we will not force anything on him. I do not imagine anyone here is going to force anything on the Government. We are arguing the question and placing it fairly and squarely before the House.

Mr. GORDON. Is it not a fair part of the argument to tell us what the service is worth before we buy it?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, every Congress that has investigated this matter, every commission that has investigated the matter, has reported in favor of the tubes; and the price as set by the commission that has investigated it was $17,000 a mile. That has been continued, and I am not in favor of making any appropriation set by any corporation. Mr. Chairman, I may say further that I do not believe those who own these tubes or operate these tubes are ready or willing to foist anything on the Government at exorbitant rates. On the contrary, they have been willing and have already placed their books at the disposal of the commissions that have been representing the Government. They have placed everything at the disposal of the commission and told them everything that is to be told. They go further than that and say that they are ready now to submit the cost of the tubes and the cost of the operation of the tubes to any commission that is appointed that will treat with them fairly, and they are ready to stand or fall upon the decision of that commission.

Mr. MOON. What right has the gentleman to demand that the Government shall pay for these tubes?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I am not demanding that the Government pay for the tubes. If it is for the efficiency of the department, if the people who are the Government are to be governed by that expenditure, they have the right, through their representatives, to come to this Congress and ask for any appropriation, no matter how great it is.

Mr. MOON. Yes; you have the right to come and ask for what you want, but when the facts show that the service is not good for the Government, that it can be carried by automobile one-third cheaper, and that the postmaster of Boston says that it is no good, you ought not to ask the Government to buy it.

Mr. IGOE. Is any of this money going for aeroplanes?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes; the automobiles and the aeroplanes have taken the money. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the chairman of the committee or the postmaster of Boston as to their opinion of the tubes. I have lived in Boston and am doing business in Boston at the present time. Every business concern, every business organization, and every business man in Boston are protesting against the abolition of these tubes. We made tests just the same as the commission appointed by the Postmaster General, who went about their work determined to do away with the tubes. We made our test fairly in the presence of newspaper men, in the presence of men interested, and the test was made by representatives of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The question I would like to have answered is, Which is the most efficient method of delivering the mail, in the city of Boston say, by pneumatic tube or by automobile?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, there is no question in my mind, from what I have seen in the dispatch of first-class mail, and that is the reason for these tubes—there is no question in my mind but what the pneumatic tubes are far superior to the automobile.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of the committee, made the statement, if I caught it correctly, that these tubes were worthless.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. He said that the postmaster said so.

Mr. MOON. That is the practical effect of what he said. The fact is that there are four or five stoppages in these tubes, on account of the crooked route, and it is claimed that in Boston the automobile can carry the mail more quickly to the depot than can be done through the tubes. A commission of five post-office officials were appointed by the Postmaster General to investigate this question, and they have undertaken to make experiments, and those five gentlemen recommended that the tubes in Boston be discontinued, because it is not to the advantage of the Government to keep them.

Mr. GARNER. I do not live in a city, and have had no experience or observation with respect to the tubes, but I desire to vote for the most efficient system the Post Office Department can conceive to deliver the mails either in the city or in the country.

Mr. TAGUE. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to quote to him what I consider a fair test and a fair answer to his question.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Is the principal controversy over the efficiency of it or the cost of it?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Both.

Mr. TAGUE. It seems to be more the cost than anything else.

Mr. GORDON. Is not that a proper thing to consider?

Mr. TAGUE. No; it is not a proper thing to consider when efficiency is at stake, when the question of delivery is at stake.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Would not the postmaster at Boston ordinarily be considered good authority upon the subject of this matter?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday, December 30, upon the permission of the postmaster of Boston, I went to the South Station tube room in my district, and that is the station that is in controversy all through the report of this commission. The postmaster of Boston sent as his representatives to make the test the superintendent of mails, the assistant superintendent of mails, one of his roundsmen, and the superintendent of the South Station. I went to the South Station tube room to find out if the report of this commission was correct. No one in any other station knew that we were there. First of all, I wanted to find out for myself, as a member of this committee, whether the statement that these tubes could only be run at intervals of 15 seconds was true. Under a stop watch, held by the superintendent of mails, the representative of the Post Office Department, these tubes came into the South Station loaded with mail at intervals of less than 10 seconds. At least more than six came in every minute. Then we wanted to find out whether the statement of this commission that the capacity of these tubes was under 5 pounds was correct. We weighed the mail taken from the tubes as it came into the South Station, and with the exception of one tube, which contained a special-delivery letter, in every tube we weighed we found more than 8 pounds of mail, and then we tested the tube as to its capacity and found that the tube would carry 15 pounds. We went further. In the report of this commission they say that it took four minutes and a half for a carrier to go from the South Station to the general office. We took a cylinder and put in that cylinder a letter signed by the superintendent of mails, and that tube was dispatched to the general office with the word to return this tube at once, and the time taken for the round trip of that tube from the South Station to the general post office was 3 minutes and 17 seconds. In the committee I asked the postmaster of my city if he was ready to stand upon the statement that it took four minutes and a half for that tube to go from the South Station to the general office, and he agreed with me that he could walk from the South Station to his own office in that time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did that involve the opening of the tube at the general office and the closing of it again?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the tube was sent from the South Station. It was opened, and the letter was read to see what was to be done with the tube. The letter was then put back into the tube in the carrier and the carrier was sealed and the carrier sent back again to the South Station.

Mr. MANN. And all that operation was completed in 3 minutes and 17 seconds?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MOON. What proportion of all of the mail is letters?

Mr. TAGUE. I should judge from the evidence submitted to the committee it was from 12 to 15 per cent.

Mr. MOON. Say 12 per cent. What proportion of that 12 per cent is carried by the tubes?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I can not tell just what the proportion is, but I will insert in the RECORD those figures.

Mr. MOON. Is it not about from 55 to 60 per cent?

Mr. TAGUE. I do not know exactly, but I can find out; but I do know this, that according to the report of this commission in the city of New York the number of pieces of mail carried per day are 1,034,678; in the city of Brooklyn, 9,488; in the city of Boston, 327,364; in Chicago, 319,884; in the city of St. Louis, 339,829; and all of this mail originated and delivered in these cities. None of this mail comes from outside. None of this mail comes on the railroad, but it is mail that is collected in the city and sent to the several stations by tube. This is a very small proportion of the general first-class mail carried daily in the pneumatic tubes. Now, it costs the Government $2,673.77 per day, and they get in return for that from these cities $40,624.94, showing a net profit on the mail collected and delivered in these cities alone, that is handled by pneumatic mail tubes, of $37,950.87. Mr. Chairman, I have taken this from the statistics filed by this commission——

Mr. MOON. Now, let us get down to facts a little bit. I know the gentleman wants to continue that tube very badly, but let us see whether that ought to be done. Now, 12 per cent of the mail that goes to the gentleman's city is letter mail. Sixty per cent of that is carried by the tubes. Now, does not that proof show very clearly in this case, owing to the stoppages of the tubes and the fact that they destroy the mail entirely frequently, that it can be expedited better by automobiles than it can by the other methods? Is not that the report of five disinterested Government officials who under the law have investigated and reported upon that question?

Mr. TAGUE. Why, Mr. Chairman, no.

Mr. MOON. That is the proof in this record.

Mr. TAGUE. I want to say frankly I do not believe the gentlemen who investigated were disinterested. The evidence submitted to the committee by the First Assistant Postmaster General, when we asked him whether or not he would have sent in a different report if he had found these figures were incorrect, was that he would have made the same report, showing to me at least that they went into this thing determined to do away with the pneumatic-tube service.

Mr MEEKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Just a moment to say that when the committee reached St. Louis the business men of St. Louis were given the munificent time of 30 minutes to get ready for it.

Mr. TAGUE. That is better than was accorded in Boston, because they were not given any consideration. Mr. Chairman, again to carry out the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], the committee reported that it took 17 minutes and 50 seconds to send mail out to the Uphams Corner post office; the superintendent of mails again made a test, and the mail was sent to Uphams Corner post office, was opened by the clerks there, and returned to the South Station post office in 16 minutes by his own watch. Then, Mr. Chairman, we made a further test. We made a test from the South Station to Essex Street, round trip, and it only took 2 minutes and 28 seconds. Then, upon the request of the superintendent of mails we made a test as against the automobile from the South Station post office to the general post office, and the Post Office Department supplied the machine and they supplied the driver and they supplied his assistant, and he took a sack of mail from the post office at South Station and with all the speed that he could make, running up the stairs of the post office with the bag on his back, it took him six minutes to deliver that bag of mail intact.

Mr. MOON. Why did you not have some of that proof before the committee?

Mr. TAGUE. Just a minute. Then the superintendent of mails took a sack of mail with approximately the same amount of mail, and he took three clerks, and the moment the automobile left the station he started to fill the carriers. He filled 12 carriers with the mail, and from the time the carriers were first opened, without any mail in them, up to the time that they were filled and the carriers delivered and emptied at the general post office, it was 3 minutes and 20 seconds, or 2½ minutes faster than the automobile went. I made that test, Mr. Chairman, to see whether or not it took 44 minutes to send 77 carriers to the general office, and 12 carriers by their own hands were sent in 3 minutes, proving to me that they were not fair in the report to the people of the city. Now, if the rest of that report is written on the same figures and can not be substantiated better than they have substantiated it in Boston—and I have seen the records as they have been sent from the city of Philadelphia——

Mr. MOON. You are talking about some stuff you have gotten up since this report was made.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, it is all right to talk about getting up stuff since reports are made; I am herewith making a reply to such reports after a real test.

Mr. MOON. Is it not a fact that what you are talking about has been written up since this report?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, that is the only way I have of proving my case. I was obliged to make my test, and no one in Boston knew the test was being made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that the pneumatic-tube report was in your hands at the time?

Mr. TAGUE. That was so. I was a member of the committee and I was handed this report on Wednesday, and I was told that it was not to be submitted to the public until Saturday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the date of that report?

Mr. TAGUE. I do not know what the date is. It was made to me on Wednesday, December 6, with the instruction it was not be given to the public until Saturday, December 9.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is on October 13, showing that from October 13 up to the time of the hearing there was no opportunity to make these tests.

Mr. TAGUE. I am sure I knew nothing about the test nor knew nothing about the report, but I was asked in the committee to vote the judgment of the Postmaster General and his assistants whom he had appointed to send this line of business to destruction. I am not ready as a member of this committee to vote to confiscate, as this does, the property of people in my district who have put their money into it, a venture that has had the indorsement of every commission since it was inaugurated until this one; and I am not ready to rest my case in the hands of a biased commission that was sent there for no other purpose. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized. I am not desiring to make a speech at this moment. I would suggest the absence of a quorum unless somebody desires to use some of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand. Is the gentleman making a motion?

Mr. MANN. No. I am occupying the floor, Mr. Chairman, consuming a part of the hour to which I am entitled.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want to consume the time?

Mr. MANN. I think, unless some one wants to consume part of the time——

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want to continue when we meet again?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I do not desire to do that. I hope you will be able to agree upon a division of time when we meet again. I think we had better rise, though.

Mr. MOON. I suppose the gentleman wants to adjourn. If so, I have no objection to move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Not yet.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the National Guard on the border.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the National Guard on the border. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 10, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on reexamination of Pass Manchac, La. (H. Doc. No. 1900); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report as to the rents received from properties located on sites of proposed public buildings purchased by the United States Government in this city (H. Doc. No. 1901); to the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Nebraska State Irrigation Association at its December, 1916, annual meeting, held in Bridgeport, Nebr.

Whereas it has become an open secret that the Government has taken over the extra carrying capacity of the Tri-State Canal for the purpose of extending said canal to cover the territory lying under the original Government survey of the North Platte project and east of the present terminus of both the Tri-State and the Government Canals; and

Whereas many homesteaders continue to occupy their holdings in patient anticipation of the coming of the water, not a few of whom have reached an age when the loss of a year is absolutely irretrievable: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this association that the Reclamation Service should push the construction of the project to speedy completion; and be it further

Resolved, That we urgently request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their best endeavors to have included in the next appropriation bill the estimated amount required for the construction of the proposed extension of said canal.

Resolutions adopted by the Nebraska State Irrigation Association at its December, 1916, annual meeting, held in Bridgeport, Nebr.

Whereas the North Platte Valley is the heart of the largest irrigated territory of Nebraska, and is one of the richest agricultural regions of the United States; and

Whereas there is now established in the upper stretches of the valley a United States experimental farm under the joint control of the Federal Government and the regents of the University of Nebraska; and

Whereas there is no agricultural school in the United States where practical irrigation is taught, nor is there a school of agriculture and mechanic arts in western Nebraska: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Nebraska State Irrigation Association, That we most respectfully and earnestly request the members of the legislature at its session in 1917 to appropriate a sum sufficient for and to establish in conjunction with the United States experimental farm located in Scottsbluff County a school of agriculture, irrigation, and mechanic arts; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge upon our Representatives in Congress to secure the aid of the Reclamation Service in the establishment and conduct of such a school.

Resolution adopted by the Nebraska State Irrigation Association at its December, 1916, annual meeting, held in Bridgeport, Nebr.

Whereas a contract has been made between the United States Reclamation Service and the water users under the North Platte project, whereby storage rights may be purchased from the Pathfinder Reservoir and paid for in 20 annual installments; and

Whereas certain other ditches in the North Platte Valley have purchased water under contract from the Pathfinder Reservoir to be paid for in 10 annual installments: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this association that the Reclamation Service should permit those ditches which have thus purchased, as well as such other ditches as may wish to purchase water in a similar manner, to pay for the same on the same terms and time as has been given to the users under the North Platte project.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to present an explanation by the Chief of the Finance Division, Bureau of Pensions, of the Interior Department, dated January 6, 1917, of the manner in which he made up a statement as to the cost incident to the volunteer officers' retired-list bill, together with a letter of the Secretary of the Interior giving the data. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, January 6, 1917.

Mr. COMMISSIONER: I have before me a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday, January 2, 1917.

In view of the statements reported therein as made on the floor of the United States Senate in debate on the bill (S. 392) to create a "Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," affecting the estimate on the cost of said bill prepared in this division having charge of the pension roll, and communicated to Hon. James Hay, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, by Secretary's letter dated March 30, 1916, I deem it pertinent to call your attention to the actual measures taken to ascertain the facts and figures presented in said estimate.

Several months prior to its preparation it was determined, in anticipation of the further consideration of measures for the retirement of Civil War volunteer officers, to prepare a separate roll of all of such officers borne on the pension roll. The consolidation of the roll in the bureau greatly facilitated this undertaking, and it was deemed necessary from the fact that estimates theretofore furnished for some time had as their basis only the reports that had been furnished a number of years previously by the pension agents—then in charge of the pension roll—when bills of like tenor were first introduced.

Furthermore, it was known that the act of May 11, 1912, granting pensions for age and length of service had greatly increased the number of officers on the roll by bringing to light many cases of subsequent service under officers' commissions by pensioners theretofore borne on the roll as privates or noncommissioned officers, it being the practice in allowance under the general laws to specify only the rank held at time of incurrence of the pensioned disability. The separate roll of officers so prepared consists of a card for each officer, containing all essential information as to rank, length of service, age, rate of pension, etc., and has been kept current by withdrawal of the cards of deceased officers as the deaths are reported and by addition of data affecting retirement cost as given in new allowances of pension to such officers from time to time.

The so-called estimate of March 30, 1916, is therefore entitled to consideration as a tabulation on the basis of the actual relevant conditions shown on the pension roll at the close of the month of February, 1916.

It is further to be noted that the separate officers' roll thus kept current carried on November 30, 1916, a total of 12,489 officers of all ranks, Army and Navy, who had served six months and over, and 582 officers who had served for periods of less than six months. On that date the total of survivors of the Civil War, officers and men, was 350,648, showing 1 officer in every 28.8 survivors, or a ratio of 1 officer to 27.8 enlisted men, not counting the 582 officers who served for periods of less than six months. On the same date the total of pensioners of all classes on the roll was 736,283, which yields a ratio of 1 officer to be benefited by the proposed retirement legislation to every 58 pensioners, including widows etc.

I find no record of information given Col. C. R. E. Koch, or other person, from an inspection of several thousand pension certificates or cases drawn promiscuously from the bureau files or otherwise, to show that out of every 55 pensioners on the roll 1 was an officer. However that may be, there can be no question as to the conclusiveness of the figures above given, as they represent the actual condition of the entire roll of pensioners living on the date specified, and not a mere haphazard percentage thereof. They show, furthermore, that the stated ratio of 1 officer to 54 privates is more nearly applicable to pensioners of all classes of all wars and the Regular Establishment than to the number of survivors of the Civil War.

The discussion over the departmental estimates given upon the Sherwood dollar-a-day bill, which did not become a law, and the Senate substitute proposition, which became a law on May 11, 1912, appears to have left the impression that the cost of the act of May 11, 1912, for the first year was $20,800,000, as compared with a departmental estimate of $22,000,000.

I invite your attention, in this connection, to an estimate prepared here on the basis of actual expenditures, and which was embodied in your statement before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on January 26, 1914, giving the cost of the act of May 11, 1912, for the first fiscal year after its passage as $27,000,000. The excess in this amount over the estimated cost is largely accounted for by the employment of some 300 temporary clerks for a large part of the year to expedite the allowance of the claims presented under said act.

A copy of the Secretary's letter of March 30, 1916, to Hon. James Hay, chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, referred to in the debate, is furnished herewith.

Very respectfully,

W. N. CAMPBELL,
Chief of Finance Division.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 30, 1916.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: I beg to submit herewith, pursuant to your request, a tabulated statement prepared from data supplied by the pension roll, showing the number of officers and the annual cost involved in legislation as proposed by bill H. R. 386, to create a Civil War volunteer officers' retired list, as follows:

OFFICERS WHO SERVED 2 YEARS AND OVER.

Rank.	Number.	Active pay.	Proposed retired pay.	Total annual retired pay.	Annual pension to be relinquished.
Brigadier general	7	$6,000.00	$1,800.00	$12,600.00	$2,880.00
Colonel	76	4,000.00	1,800.00	136,800.00	30,408.00
Lieutenant colonel	209	3,500.00	1,750.00	365,750.00	76,128.00

OFFICERS WHO SERVED 1 YEAR AND LESS THAN 2 YEARS.

Colonel	13	$4,000.00	$900.00	$11,700.00	$4,332.00

Second lieutenant	797	1,700.00	425.00	338,725.00	227,289.00

OFFICERS WHO SERVED 6 MONTHS AND LESS THAN 1 YEAR.

Colonel	5	$4,000.00	$450.00	$2,250.00	$1,290.00

First lieutenant	106	2,000.00	250.00	26,500.00	23,712.00
Second lieutenant	6	1,700.00	212.50	1,275.00	1,008.00

Total number of officers	12,598
Total annual retired pay	$11,887,375
Total pension to be relinquished	$4,164,528
Annual cost of retirement as proposed by the bill	$7,722,847

Naval officers are included in the above tabulation by relative rank.

There were on the pension roll on February 29, 1916, a total of 13,534 Regular and volunteer officers who served six months or longer in the Civil War. The difference of 936 between that number and the number given in the table represents those who are in receipt of pension in excess of what they might obtain as retired pay under the provisions of the bill.

No estimate can be given of the additional cost involved by the provision for maximum retired pay, regardless of length of service, to officers who lost an eye, an arm, or a leg, or were discharged by reason of wounds, etc., without a tabulation by disabilities as shown in their claims, which has not been undertaken because of the time and labor that would be involved.

The letter of Hon. JOHN E. RAKER addressed to you under date of the 20th instant and copy of bill received therewith, on which is indorsed the request for the above information, are herewith returned.

Very truly, yours,

ANDRIEUS A. JONES,
Acting Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15617) to establish fish-hatching and fish-cultural stations in the States of Alabama; California; Louisiana; Florida; Georgia, South Carolina, or North Carolina; Maryland or Virginia; Oregon or Washington; Texas; Oklahoma; Illinois; Washington; Arizona; New Mexico; Michigan; Idaho; Missouri; Pennsylvania, Delaware, or New Jersey; and Minnesota, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 911) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6251) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John F. Kelly, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 912) thereon.

WINTON AGAINST AMOS.

Mr. ASHURST. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Indian Affairs Senate resolution 309. I submit a report (No. 916) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution. First let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Court of Claims is hereby requested to report to the Senate what facts have been found in the case of Charles F. Winton and others against Jack Amos, what facts are still in controversy according to the contention of the parties, including all requests for finding of fact made or filed during the present term, and the action of the court thereon.

Mr. CLARK. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report is called for, and it will be read.

The Secretary read the report this day submitted by Mr. ASHURST, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the Senate resolution 309, having investigated the same, report it favorably without amendment and recommend its passage.

The case of Winton v. Amos was sent to the Court of Claims in 1906, and it is desirable for the Committee on Indian Affairs to know its present status with a view to some disposition that will bring the subject matter to a conclusion, as there is a lien pending by the act of Congress of 1908 on the Indian land, which affects injuriously the selling price of the land. It is desirable that this lien be terminated without delay. The findings appear to have been made and printed and various appeals perfected, so that the records of matters desired are all easily available.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona if this case has as yet been concluded as far as the Court of Claims is concerned?

Mr. ASHURST. My information is that it has not.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator think we ought to ask for a report on a partial hearing or determination of the case?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not hear the Senator clearly.

Mr. CLARK. I understand from the Senator that this is a case pending before the Court of Claims in which that court has not arrived at any conclusion. I asked the Senator if he thought it wise to ask the Court of Claims to report to us on a partial hearing or determination of the case.

Mr. ASHURST. There are two views in the committee.

Mr. CLARK. It is nothing that I am concerned in, of course, except in the orderly transaction of business.

Mr. ASHURST. One view is that the case has been concluded and the other view is that it has not been concluded. The committee wants the information as to what are the facts and it can then form its own judgment as to the situation.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

TORRENS SYSTEM OF LAND TITLES (S. DOC. NO. 675).

Mr. CHILTON. I report favorably from the Committee on Printing a resolution (S. Res. 311). I desire to explain that it simply authorizes the printing of the manuscript of what is known as the Torrens system of land-title registration. It has been fully considered by the Committee on Printing and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] on December 18, 1916, entitled "Uniform land registration act, adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and the American Bar Association," be printed as a Senate document.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT (S. DOC. NO. 500).

Mr. FLETCHER. I report favorably from the Committee on Printing a resolution (S. Res. 308).

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 13,500 additional copies of Senate document No. 500, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "Federal farm-loan act," for the use of the Senate document room.

JAMES ANDERSON.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 1093) for the relief of James Anderson and I submit a report (No. 914) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to it.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill. A similar bill passed the Senate last March. When it reached the House it was referred to the committee, and in the meantime the House passed a similar bill which had been reported from the House committee without taking action upon the Senate bill. Action on this bill is desired, so that a bill which has passed both the House and the Senate may become a law. It is to correct the military record of a man who served three years and was severely wounded in August, 1863, and failed to complete his service because of wounds received in the line of duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas requests the immediate consideration of a bill which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws James Anderson, who was a private in Company A, Cass County Regiment Missouri Home Guards, and Company A, Second Battalion Missouri State Military Cavalry, and Company F, Fourteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of the last-mentioned company and regiment on the 19th day of December, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOUNDARY LINE, SALMON BAY, WASH.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 6807) fixing and establishing a boundary line between the property of the United States of America, on Salmon Bay, State of Washington, and the property of Betterton-Morgan Co. (Incorporated), a corporation, giving authority and providing for the conveyance of property in connection therewith, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 915) thereon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is one of purely local character and is of some urgency. We are very anxious to get the bill passed, and I therefore ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 2, after the name "Company," to strike out "(Incorporated)" and insert "Inc.," so as to read:

There there be, and there hereby is, fixed and established a boundary line between lots 1 to 5, both inclusive, in block 6 of Seattle tidelands, Seattle, King County, Wash., the property of the United States of America, and that part of Government lot 6 in section 11, township 25 north, of range 3 east, Willamette meridian, King County, State of Washington, adjacent to and abutting upon said tideland lots and owned by the Betterton-Morgan Co., Inc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 20, after the word "Company," to insert "Inc.," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of preserving and maintaining the superficial area of said tideland lots, and as one of the conditions upon which said boundary line is fixed and established, the Betterton-Morgan Co., Inc., be, and it is hereby, required to convey to the United States of America, by warranty deed, the following-described tract or parcel of real estate situated in said Government lot 6, Seattle, King County, Wash.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 17, after the word "feet," to insert a comma and the words "more or less," so as to read:

Beginning at a point 160.315 feet south from the harbor line in Salmon Bay, King County, State of Washington, and 14.26 feet east of the west line of Government lot 6 in section 11, township 25 north of range 3 east, Willamette meridian, which is the true point of beginning; thence running easterly 160.315 feet from and parallel to the harbor line in Salmon Bay, King County, Wash., as established by the State of Washington, a distance of 178.48 feet to Salmon Bay; thence westerly along the south line of Salmon Bay to the west line of lot 1 in block 6, Seattle tidelands; thence south along said west line of said lot 1 produced a distance of 20.315 feet to the point of beginning; said parcel of land containing an area of 2,777 square feet, more or less.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 18, after the word "That," to insert "upon the release and discharge of the United States by the Betterton-Morgan Co., Inc., of all claims of any kind or character whatsoever which have arisen or may hereafter arise against the United States because of damage or injury to property of said Betterton-Morgan Co., Inc., contiguous to block 6 Seattle tidelands, Seattle, King County, Wash., occasioned by improvements made by the United States in the Salmon Bay waterway."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 22, after the word "Company," to strike out "(Incorporated)" and insert "Inc.," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, for and on behalf of the United States of America, and in connection with the establishment of said boundary line, to convey by quitclaim deed to said Betterton-Morgan Co., Inc., the following-described tract or parcel of land situated in the county of King, State of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 18, after the word "less," to insert:

Provided, That all expenses connected with the conveyance of the within described tracts or parcels of land, including the recordation of the necessary instruments, shall be defrayed by the Betterton-Morgan Co., Inc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill fixing and establishing a boundary line between the property of the United States of America, on Salmon Bay, State of Washington, and the property of the Betterton-Morgan Co., Inc., a corporation, giving authority and providing for the conveyance of property in connection therewith, and for other purposes."

WILLIAM H. WOODS.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 10007) for the relief of William H. Woods, and I submit a report (No. 913) thereon. The bill provides for the payment to the beneficiary of the sum of $152.21 out of the Choctaw and Chickasaw funds. The bill has already passed the House, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma explain the purport of the bill?

Mr. OWEN. The bill provides that $152.21 shall be taken out of the Choctaw and Chickasaw funds to pay one of the assistant attorneys in Oklahoma for expenses incurred. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. The bill has passed the House of Representatives and has been favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate this morning.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the bill (S. 7777) to provide for constructing a fish ladder in Salmon River, in Custer County, Idaho, was introduced yesterday by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and referred to the Committee on Commerce. The bill pertains to fishery matters and should properly go to the Committee on Fisheries. I therefore ask that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection to the request, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. STONE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 194) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur March 1, 1917, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which will occur on March 1, 1917, by reason of the expiration of the term of Mr. John B. Henderson, of the city of Washington, be filled by the reappointment of the said John B. Henderson for the ensuing term.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LANE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500 to aid the Columbia Polytechnic Institute for the Blind, located in Washington, D. C., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19119), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SOUTH CAROLINA BOLL WEEVIL COMMISSION.

Mr. TILLMAN. I offer the following resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 312) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "Report of the South Carolina Boll Weevil Commission, Bulletin No. 30 of Clemson Agricultural College of South Carolina," be printed as a Senate document, and that 100,000 additional copies be printed, of which 50,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate Document Room and 50,000 for the use of the House Document Room.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is well known that the boll weevil has wrought immense damage to the southern cotton growers. Entering this country 25 years ago, it has steadily marched eastward along isothermal lines, until now it is in the middle of Georgia, rapidly approaching the South Carolina border.

The necessity for teaching the farmers the right steps to be taken to meet this invasion induced the friends of our agricultural college in conjunction with the National Government to send a commission to Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and other States which have been devastated in the past. That commission has made a report, which is published by Clemson College as Bulletin No. 20. This bulletin was prepared by Dr. Riggs, president of that college, and merits very wide circulation, even in those States which have already been devastated, because it contains information and suggestions for those engaged in agriculture which are very valuable anywhere in the South. I have offered this resolution, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Printing, as the law requires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

TENNIE A. ANDERSON.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 780, being the bill (H. R. 6267) to reimburse Tennie A. Anderson, postmaster at Maplewood, Fayette County, W. Va., for money orders and postage stamps stolen. This bill has been passed by the House and has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It simply proposes to appropriate $152.16 for payment to a poor woman, which amount the Government justly owes her on account of some post-office matters.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not hear the request of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. It is to take up Order of Business 780, being House bill 6267.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe there is a disposition on the part of most Senators to have the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill passed this morning before we go into executive session.

Mr. CHILTON. This bill is one of several such bills.

Mr. SMOOT. There will be other requests to take similar bills from the calendar, and I shall object to their consideration in the morning hour.

Mr. CHILTON. I appeal to the Senator not to object to this bill. It is a bill which has already passed the other House and involves only $152.16.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of the amount involved, and it is not a question of the bill itself; but I object to the consideration of the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was about to ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 14822) to prevent and punish the desecration, mutilation, or improper use within the District of Columbia of the flag of the United States of America; and I hope the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will not object to that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am obliged to object to any bills being taken up from the calendar. I want to get through with the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill during the morning hour.

Mr. CHILTON. We can object to that, can we not?

Mr. OVERMAN. Any Senator can object to the consideration of an appropriation bill who desires to do so; but I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 19300, being the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina requests unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. During the morning hour.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course I do not wish to object to that request. I hope the appropriation bill will be taken up, and I think it ought to pass this morning; but the Senate can not, I think, be oblivious to the fact that a large number of us here have bills which we desire to get up during the morning hour. This is, I believe, the fifth time that I have attempted to get up for consideration House bill 12426, authorizing the Indians to mine on their own reservations and authorizing other persons to make leases.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. ASHURST. I am not going to object to the request of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator from Arizona that I have never objected——

Mr. ASHURST. I know the Senator has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate will bear me out in the statement that I have never objected to the consideration of bills, except in a case like the present, when, unless under unanimous consent I get this bill through during the morning hour, it will have to go over.

Mr. CHILTON. Would it not be well to finish the morning business before the bill is brought up?

Mr. THOMAS. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina requests unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course I wish to finish my short statement, if I am in order. I do not wish, as I have stated, to object to the request of the Senator from North Carolina. I think the bill to which he refers should pass, and that it should pass this morning; but I now give notice that at the earliest opportunity when I may do so in order I shall ask the Senate to consider House bill 12426.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have sat quietly in my seat and allowed unanimous consent for the passage of certain bills this morning. I now wish to suggest, however, that there are more than a hundred private bills on the calendar involving small sums of money. Some of those bills have passed the House of Representatives. I think, instead of taking up these bills one at a time in the morning hour, we ought to be sensible enough to go to the calendar and to pass uncontested cases on the calendar. I am always loath to object to a request made by a Senator for the consideration of a bill, but I think I shall do so until the calendar is regularly considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no, Mr. President; I do not object to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not wish to object, but I desire to give notice, while notices are being given, that I am going to call up at every possible opportunity the Porto Rican government bill, and I expect to avail myself of the morning hour to do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do wish to object until we get through with the routine morning business.

Mr. OVERMAN. Perhaps the Senator does not understand the reason for my request.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have not gotten through with the routine morning business as yet.

Mr. OVERMAN. We are about through with it; but I desire to say to the Senator that the reason I made the motion was that we have a unanimous-consent agreement that when we get through with the morning business we shall go into executive session, and unless I can get the appropriation bill up at this time I do not know when I can get it up again.

Mr. McCUMBER. It probably will not take five minutes to get through with the routine morning business.

Mr. OVERMAN. And when we have gotten through with it I can not get up the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. With that explanation of the Senator, I will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HUGHES. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina so long as it is understood that it does not interfere with the unanimous-consent agreement already entered into whereby at the close of the routine morning business of the day we are to go into executive session. So long as that is understood and nobody makes the point, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the appropriation bill will probably create discussion that may go on all afternoon, so that the routine morning business could not be closed until about five minutes to 5 o'clock, and then we would not have sufficient opportunity to consider matters in executive session.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will suggest to the Senator that the morning hour will expire at 2 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator from North Carolina think that if this bill is considered now there will be plenty of time for the discussion of matters in executive session?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we can get through with this bill in an hour and a half.

Mr. JONES. I am only anxious that there shall be plenty of time to consider matters in executive session. I shall not object to the request of the Senator from North Carolina.

After the transaction of routine business, which appears under its appropriate heading,

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope that my request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill may now be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 19300) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments reported by the committee be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be first considered. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 22, on page 2.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to move, on behalf of the committee, an amendment changing the total and also an amendment, in line 12, which will effect a saving of $2,700 in the appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 12, after the word "Honduras," it is proposed to strike out "Morocco"; in line 14 to strike out "$240,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$230,000"; after line 17 insert "Agent and consul general at Tangier, $7,500"; and in line 22 to correct the total so as to read "$534,500."

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to say that this amendment has been recommended by the State Department, and I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter and memorandum from the department in order that the conferees may have it before them when they come to consider amendments to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and memorandum referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 9, 1917.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR OVERMAN: By direction of the Secretary I am inclosing for your consideration a memorandum of the reasons why the department feels that it is important to change the grade of its diplomatic establishment in Morocco from that of minister plenipotentiary to that of diplomatic agent and consul general. In view of the arrangement just reached with the French Government, it is most desirable that the change be made in the pending Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The Secretary would, therefore, greatly appreciate any favorable action that the committee may take in regard to this matter.

I am, my dear Senator,
Very sincerely, yours,

WILBUR J. CARR,
Director of the Consular Service.

MEMORANDUM.

On the 30th of March, 1912, a treaty was ratified by France and Morocco providing for a form of government under the protectorate of France. The various European powers at various times within the last three years have recognized the French protectorate and changed the grade of their missions at Tangier to diplomatic agencies and consulates general. The Governments represented in Morocco are Great Britain, United States, France, Spain, Portugal, and Belgium. Germany and Austria have no representatives in Morocco at the present time on account of the war, and their interests are being cared for by the representative of the United States.

The United States is the only Government having a representative in Morocco which has not recognized the French protectorate in that country and suppressed its diplomatic mission and substituted therefor a diplomatic agency. The delay of the United States in recognizing a protectorate has been due to a number of reasons, but an understanding has just been reached with the French Government under which the United States can now extend the recognition already accorded by the other Governments. Hence it becomes necessary to give the representative of the United States in Morocco the grade of diplomatic agent instead of minister plenipotentiary, as at present. The continuance of a full diplomatic mission in Tangier would place the United States in an anomalous position and be contrary to the wishes of the Government of France and, on the other hand, the functions to be performed could not be intrusted to the consul general in Tangier, because the act of Algeciras provides that certain measures therein described relating to the Government of Morocco shall be carried out by the diplomatic corps at Tangier, of which, naturally, the consul general can not be a member.

It is therefore urged that in the Diplomatic and Consular bill now before Congress the appropriation for an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Morocco at $10,000 be omitted and that there be substituted a provision as follows: "Agent and consul general at Tangier, $7,500."

It is highly desirable that the salary of the diplomatic agent and consul general be not less than $7,500, because of the fact that the diplomatic agency is intended to supersede a full diplomatic mission and, therefore, should not be impaired in prestige by too great a change in the salary attached to the office. A smaller salary would not permit the agent to maintain a standard of living under the peculiar circumstances which would be consistent with the agent's greatest usefulness.

JANUARY 9, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Salaries of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service," on page 3, line 6, after "$186,000," to strike out:

Provided, however, That no secretary who as chargé d'affaires at any time during 1916 refused any privilege to any American citizen because such citizen criticized the President of the United States shall be paid any salary from this appropriation.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having this bill in charge if this is the proviso that relates to the incident of Charles Edward Russell at Paris?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think that this proposition presents a somewhat fundamental question that ought to receive some consideration. As I understand, the reason why this provision was inserted in the House was this: Mr. Charles Edward Russell had criticized the President of the United States, and when he presented himself at the American Embassy in Paris was denied a passport or other privilege because of that criticism, as stated to him by the secretary of the embassy. This provision is inserted in the bill, I imagine, as a sort of punishment to the secretary and an enunciation of doctrine.

Outside of the question of the propriety of criticizing the President of the United States, which may be a very delicate matter, especially when the criticism of the President is made abroad, the fundamental question is whether an American citizen has the same right when abroad that he has at home, and whether he shall be denied the ordinary rights of an American citizen or usual courtesies because he may have criticized the President of the United States. Furthermore, if he should do so, who is to determine the question of whether he should be denied the rights of an American citizen because of that fact, and who is to determine the fact whether or not he did criticize the President of the United States? Is that to be turned over to a clerk or a secretary of some of our embassies? Though speaking only for myself, and not defending in any way anybody who may criticize the President of the United States abroad—that may be an indelicate thing to do—I am simply insisting that an American citizen has the right to criticize the President of the United States, if he so desires, and if he does he should not be denied the rights of an American citizen either at home or abroad. On this provision I simply wish to ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this man, it seems, was denied no rights, but rather a mere courtesy, although one usually extended to an American citizen. He had gone abroad, and it was there, in a foreign country, while the war was going on, that he had denounced the President in the public press, and this official refused to extend to him the usual courtesies ordinarily extended to American citizens. Before the vote is taken I should like to have read a letter from the Secretary of State in regard to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 29, 1916.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MARTIN: It appears that the Diplomatic and Consular bill, H. R. 19300, passed the House with an amendment on page 3, line 6, after the end of line 6, as follows:

"Provided, however, That no secretary who as chargé d'affaires at any time during 1916 refused any privilege to any American citizen because such citizen criticized the President of the United States shall be paid any salary from this appropriation."

The explanation of the amendment is contained in certain correspondence introduced by Representative BENNET, of New York, between Mr. Robert W. Bliss, then chargé d'affaires of the American embassy in Paris, and Mr. Charles Edward Russell, an American citizen. It appears that Mr. Russell wrote a letter to the Paris edition of the New York Herald, dated August 28, in which he makes certain criticisms of the President of the United States.

It also appears that on the next day, August 29, Mr. Russell called upon Mr. Bliss with a view to obtaining certain privileges from the Belgian Government, and that Mr. Bliss on the same day informed him by letter that in view of his criticism of the President as contained in the letter above referred to he did not feel justified in giving him a letter of recommendation to the Belgian legation.

While public criticism of the President of the United States by American citizens in the United States is not a matter in which this department can concern itself, the criticism of the President by Americans in the press of foreign countries bears directly upon the international relations of the United States. It is my opinion, therefore, that an American citizen who avails himself of an opportunity to discredit the standing of the President of the United States through the press of a foreign country can not expect that the diplomatic representatives of the United States shall seek to secure special privileges for him from foreign governments, privileges which he can not ask as a matter of right but which are wisely left to the discretion of our representatives.

In these circumstances I have no hesitancy in pointing out that the action of Mr. Bliss in declining to give Mr. Russell a letter of recommendation to the Belgian legation was proper and fully justified. I have no doubt, my dear Senator, that you will share these views, and that you will be glad to take such steps as may be necessary to remove from the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill the amendment in question.

I am, my dear Senator MARTIN,
Sincerely, yours, ROBERT LANSING.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when my attention was first called to this matter, as it was at the time of the debate in the House, it seemed to me that it was a very dangerous precedent to establish that our representatives abroad could undertake to refuse recognition to reasonable requests of American citizens because they had made political criticisms of the President or political criticisms of any kind. I thought it was a very dangerous precedent to make. In the eyes of our representatives abroad Americans who apply to them for protection or for any other service must be regarded simply as Americans. They can not be regarded otherwise than as citizens of the United States, and our representatives abroad have no right to inquire into their politics.

But examining further into this particular case I found in the first place that the request was not in the nature of a right. It was not a request for a passport. It was a request for a personal letter of introduction—a courtesy usually extended as I understand to newspaper correspondents by our embassies; but it was a courtesy purely. There was no right involved.

In the second place, I found what is stated by the Secretary of State—that this criticism of the President was not a criticism made in the United States, where any citizen has a right to make respectful criticisms on the President or anybody else in public life. It was made in Paris, in a paper published in Paris, and in time of war. I will not trouble the Senate by reading the letter. It criticized the President because he had written the usual felicitations or congratulations under such circumstances to the Emperor of Austria on his accession to the throne. It may be an absurd formula, as Mr. Russell described it, but it is usual to make those formal felicitations; and the President was criticized rather severely for this by Mr. Russell in a letter published in the Paris edition of the New York Herald.

I think that puts a very different complexion on this case. Further, Mr. President, I think we ought to remember that if there is misconduct on the part of any representative of the United States abroad this is not the way to deal with it—to take away the salary from the office in an appropriation bill. It is the duty of others to deal with it. If we wish to call attention to it it is our duty and our right to bring to the attention of the executive authority the fact that the person in question has been guilty of improper conduct. I do no like this way of getting at it, assuming that what Mr. Bliss did was improper. But under the circumstances—the place where the attack was published and the fact that only a courtesy was asked in the way of a letter of introduction—it seems to me that it is hardly fitting for us to take such action as the House provision proposes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, all of us in this body, I think, have learned to respect and admire the high-minded stand which the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] usually takes upon public matters. I should like to inquire of him now, in view of the report made on this matter by the accredited representatives of the Government, and the supplementary statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], whether he does not really think that instead of a reprimand our subordinate officer in the Paris Embassy is entitled rather to the commendation of his country for thus expressing his disapprobation of the conduct of American citizens who go abroad and in the very midst of the most delicate international complications venture to criticize the President of the United States in such a way as to embarrass the pending delicate negotiations?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. What was the nature of this criticism? Was there anything of substance to it?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Montana will allow me, I have just handed the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] the letter in question, published in the Paris edition of the New York Herald. Perhaps it would be well to have it read from the desk.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that it be read.

Mr. WALSH. We gathered from the public press, as now stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the President extended the ordinary felicitations to the Emperor of Austria upon his accession to the throne; and the bare fact that the President had thus extended the usual and customary felicitations becomes the occasion for some severe criticism of the President of the United States through a newspaper published in the capital of one of the countries at war with the Empire of Austria.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa requests the reading of the letter referred to, published abroad. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The letter is found copied on page 771 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 22, 1916, and reads as follows:

To the EDITOR OF THE HERALD:

SIR: I rejoice to see that Americans have entered their protest in your columns against President Wilson's most strange and grotesque felicitations to the Austrian Emperor.

This abominable person represents the antipodes of everything for which America is supposed to stand. He has not one ideal that is capable of being squared with ours. At a time like this, when the fundamentals of our faith are under desperate attacks from him and his allies, it is most deplorable to compromise about an issue that transcends everything else in the world. Courtesy is all very well, but if you really believe what you profess can you be courteous to a power that is aiming its guns straight at the heart of democracy. A country is not certain outlines on a map. It is an idea. If the idea of America and the idea of the Austrian Monarchy are compatible, then the Republic must be something very different from our protensions about it.

CHARLES EDWARD RUSSELL.

HOTEL DE FRANCE ET CHOISEUL,
Paris, August 28, 1916.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, there is only one reference there to the President; that is, what the writer considers the grotesque proposition of offering these felicitations. All the balance of this discussion with reference to an individual is with regard to another person. Is that correct? That is my understanding of it, at least. If I had been in the place of Mr. Russell, or the party who wrote the letter, I certainly should not have written it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator if he would have gone to the American Embassy the next day to get the courtesy of a letter commending him to anybody in Europe, if he had written the letter? Would the Senator have done that under the circumstances?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should not have written the letter. But an entirely different proposition is submitted to us here, it seems to me. I do not consider that there is anything serious about that. It certainly did not, in all probability, impeach the standing of the President of the United States in the mind of anyone in Europe. It did not have the effect of impeaching him in any respect among those with whom he desired to stand well, under those conditions; and it is making a mountain out of a molehill to bring it into legislation here.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator think this is the proper place to remove a diplomatic and consular officer or attaché?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No. He ought to be left out of this legislation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that a provision should be inserted in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill providing that a man appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and accredited to a foreign country shall have no salary?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I am not indorsing that proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is really the issue here.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see why so small and inconsequential an affair should be brought into legislation at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was brought in in the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are striking it out.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will address the Chair, one at a time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps the Senator did not understand that that is just the point. Somebody introduced an amendment to the bill which provides that this subordinate officer of the embassy shall not receive his salary by reason of this alleged offense that he committed.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, his offense consisted of the mere withholding of a letter of introduction.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. That is all.

Mr. WALSH. The question is, Shall we agree to that?

Mr. BORAH. It is a tempest in a teapot.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. HUGHES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I understand this matter correctly, the limitation upon the right of our representatives abroad was placed in the bill in the House. As it comes here, the provision is stricken out. Am I correct about that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It was stricken out by the Senate committee and reported here.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And we are now called upon to ratify the committee's course in that regard?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir. That is the state of affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So that the matter is entirely eliminated from the appropriation bill, and it is left where it properly belongs—with the Department of State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the Senator will bear in mind that the position which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] took was that the House provision should not be stricken out, but should remain in the bill, and he said he would ask for the yeas and nays upon it. I agree with the Senator that it is not a subject for legislation upon an appropriation bill under any circumstances; and even if there had been fault here, to punish the officer by saying that he shall not have his salary, it seems to me, is a very poor way of bringing about results. Men act upon their judgment. If they are mistaken in their judgment, they should not be punished in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, limiting the right of an American citizen abroad to express his opinion about the President of the United States, even to the extent that this provision would be effective, would not be wholesome legislation. An American citizen abroad who offends against the proprieties of his citizenship is answerable to public opinion, and no criticism could be more severe than the criticism which would fall on him by reason of any indiscreet words or acts upon his part. I think it would be a very strange innovation in our legislation to place such a limitation as that on an appropriation bill. I am sorry the House of Representatives thought it necessary to go so far, and I desire to commend the Committee on Appropriations for this exercise of their discretion and sound judgment in striking out that provision. I should dislike very much to see it reinstated or to see the principle recognized by our Government.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will not ask for the yeas and nays on this question. My protest was based on the thought that an American citizen had the same rights abroad that he had here.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He has.

Mr. KENYON. And that he had the right to criticize the President of the United States abroad, even though it might not be a wise or discreet thing to do, just as well as he would have that right here; and that no secretary of a legation had the right to refuse him the same kind of treatment that he accorded others simply because he had criticized the President of the United States, which I understand was the situation here. I understand that a number of parties went to the embassy at the same time, under the same circumstances, and Mr. Russell was the only one to be denied the favor, if it be called a favor, at the hands of the embassy. I doubt, however, upon reflection, as to this being the proper way to raise the question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I should like to suggest that if those American citizens who have been unfortunate enough to be obliged to remain in the Republic of Mexico during the last four years without any assistance whatever from their own Government, again and again assaulted and crimes unnamable inflicted upon them, could not in their anguish cry out against the officers of their Government who have neglected them, I would think, indeed, that the rights of American citizens were fast disappearing as a part of our national curriculum. A man should exercise discretion; but even Senators on both sides of the Chamber fail to do that always while speaking of officers of their Government, and their words have much more potency and meaning among foreigners than the words of travelers abroad.

I sympathize very much with the idea that the Senator from Iowa has at heart, but I think this matter could best be regulated by the Department of State,

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, it seems to me one aspect of the case has been overlooked, and that is the conduct of the gentleman in question in using the language he used toward the head of one of the Governments of Europe. Regardless of the criticism of the President of the United States, which in certain quarters is very common and is justified by people privately who do not justify it publicly, leaving that aside, assuming for the sake of argument that it is the right of American citizens abroad to criticize the President of the United States and abuse him, that it is their right to refuse to speak the language of their own Nation in order to show the various countries in which they happen to be that they are more French than the French, more German than the Germans, and more English than the English, yet we have to consider the effect caused by this man's assault upon a reigning sovereign of Europe in connection with his request that he be given a letter of introduction, indorsement, and approval by our representative in another country to enable him to pursue his journey throughout the Continent of Europe.

It seems to me that the secretary at our embassy acted not only within his discretion but that he exercised a wise discretion when he refused to give a letter under the circumstances, and rather than have his salary taken away from him I should like to see a proposition to increase his salary; that is, if we are to decide these questions in this way on appropriation bills. Rather than take his salary away from him his salary should be increased. I am glad that he had the courage to do what it was his bounden duty to do under the circumstances, to say to this gentleman, while he could not in any way prevent him from exercising his privilege as a native-born American of abusing his own Government and the representatives thereof he had no right, residing in a foreign country and desiring to operate under the approval and indorsement of a letter from the representatives of America in a foreign country, to abuse the representatives of those countries.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question? I should like to inquire what was the nature of the letter of recommendation or favor, if it were a favor, that this gentleman requested?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not suppose anyone knows. I presume it was the ordinary letter of introduction and approval such as the Senator and myself are in the habit of giving to people whom we think worthy of them.

Mr. OVERMAN. He just wanted an indorsement of the American Embassy.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me as to whether our representative declined to comply with the request would depend altogether upon what the request was.

Mr. LODGE. The request was for a personal letter to get certain privileges from the Belgian Government as a newspaper correspondent.

Mr. NORRIS. And they refused to give it to him because he had criticized the President.

Mr. LODGE. Because of the publication of this letter.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while I favor the amendment of the committee, and it seems to me this provision ought to be stricken out of the bill, I do not want my vote in favor of striking it out to be construed as an approval necessarily of the conduct of the American representative. It does not seem to me that he ought to have declined to give this man a letter that would assist him in his investigation as a newspaper correspondent unless he had evidence to show that he was going to take advantage of or abuse the privilege this favor would extend to him. Based on the ground that he had criticized the President, it seems to me, it was entirely erroneous; but even though the official were guilty of misconduct, or a very great lack of good judgment in declining for the reason that he had criticized the President to give him this letter, it is not a sufficent reason why he should not draw his salary. No matter how much we may disagree with him as to his action, I think we would have to concede that he had a right to decline, even though his reasons were not satisfactory to us, and his salary ought not to be taken away from him because he did decline.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. How would the Senator enforce the House provision? The Senator will observe that it is confined to the year 1916. It makes the broad statement that in a given state of facts a certain official shall not receive a salary. Who would decide the existence of those facts? There is no provision here for a reference even to a commission to determine the facts. One Government official might think the facts were one way and another might think they were another way. In other words, the House provision is on its face an unenforceable one; there is no machinery provided for determining the facts.

Mr. NORRIS. I think what the Senator says has a great deal of weight. I presume if it is left in the law the official who would pay him or give him his warrant would take notice of the law and enforce it. However, I do not want the Senator from West Virginia to get the idea that I favor this language.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not so understand.

Mr. NORRIS. I am in favor of striking it out. I think it would be a sad mistake to leave the language in, and I would not have said anything about it if it had not been that I understood the roll was to be called and other Senators said we ought to increase the salary of this secretary for this act. I did not want any action of mine to be construed as an approval of the American official who declined to give the letter.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. JAMES. Would the Senator, on the other hand, want his vote to be construed as an approval of the conduct of an American citizen on foreign soil abusing the President of his own country?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think this vote would be construed as such an approval. There might be a great deal of evidence that ought to be taken into consideration when we pass on such a law. From what I have heard here it does not seem to me that he ought to have declined to grant him a letter, if he was of the opinion that the privilege the letter would have given would not be abused, even though he had criticized the President of the United States. It does not seem to me that that is alone a sufficient reason. There might have been other reasons. I have not heard of any.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the Senator think if this American citizen wanted to abuse the President of his own country it would have been more becoming in him to withhold his abuse and criticism until he returned home rather than to indulge in it upon foreign soil and then seek the protection of the very Government whose President be is abusing?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe that a citizen of the United States who criticizes the President of the United States, however severely, necessarily on account of that conduct surrenders any right he may have to protection as a citizen of the United States. I would be sorry to see an American citizen go abroad and criticize the President unnecessarily; I would be sorry to see it done here; but at the same time we disagree about those things; and we can not lay down a rule, it seems to me, that a man shall not be allowed to criticize a President of the United States here or abroad. That is going too far.

Mr. JAMES. It is not a question of protection; it is merely a question of courtesy. He asked the courtesy of a letter, in no way as a matter of protection to an American citizen.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is more than a courtesy, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. JAMES. A man who seeks a courtesy must do so in a courteous manner.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The language in the proviso is "any privilege."

Mr. NORRIS. But even though it were just a courtesy, I do not believe any official of our Government ought to set up a rule, even though he can say this is a courtesy that I can grant or refuse as I please. Conceding that for argument's sake—I do not believe it, but conceding it all for argument's sake—an official ought not even to deny a courtesy because the man who asks the courtesy did not agree with him or had expressed an opinion in regard to the efficiency of any official, whether it be the President or anybody else. As long as the request he was making had nothing to do with that, and he was only asking the protection that he wanted to get as an American citizen, I think he ought to have gotten it, even though he had done wrong in criticizing the President of the United States. But upon that I express no opinion; I do not know anything about whether he did wrong or not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate were unanimous in agreeing to strike the proviso from the bill. There were but two points considered. One was that the provision stricken out by the committee or similar provisions have no place upon an appropriation bill; that it is out of place and out of order to try to legislate on an appropriation bill on matters of this kind.

Again, all the members of the Committee on Appropriations took the ground, as I understand it, that the party affected had not been denied any right as an American citizen. He simply asked for a letter of introduction or a letter of commendation, and the secretary in charge thought that because of the criticism of the President it was his place to deny the letter, which he had a perfect right to do.

That being the case, Mr. President, the committee were unanimous in deciding that an appropriation bill is no place for legislation of this character, and I believe every Senator will agree to that, now that the facts in the case are known.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to join in thanking the Appropriations Committee for striking this provision from the bill. I do not believe in this kind of legislation on an appropriation bill. They were right to strike it out, even if generally they might have approved it.

But, in the next place, what would it do? It says that the pay of the secretary is to be cut off if he refused any privilege to any American citizen—not a right, a privilege—who criticized the President of the United States.

I agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]. I do not think the criticism of the President amounted in this case to a great deal, although clearly improper. The abusive language by a citizen of the United States published in a foreign newspaper, directed at the governing power of one of the governing powers of a great European country was more serious.

Mr. THOMAS. May I suggest to the Senator that if the letter of Mr. Russell had assailed the administration for something it said or declined to say affecting the ruler or the Government where Mr. Russell then was, a letter of recommendation from the Secretary to him might well subject the embassy to the suspicion of indorsing the writer's view, which might prove embarrassing. Yet if he must under the actual circumstances give the desired letter or be punished by deprivation of salary, he must also give it under the circumstances suggested. But the impropriety, even the danger, of doing so is obvious.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, of course I agree with the Senator from Colorado that it is in very bad taste for American citizens to go abroad and publish letters criticizing their own Chief Executive. What I meant was that this particular criticism was rather trivial compared to the balance of the letter which assaulted one of the ruling powers of Europe. Our citizens show very poor taste and very little sense when they go abroad and write letters of this character.

I agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]. If I were doing anything I would express my approbation of the conduct of the embassy in declining to give a letter of introduction to this kind of an American citizen. But no matter what the facts are, this bill is no place to deal with the subject; and I again say that I shall not only vote to support the report of the Committee on Appropriations in striking out the proviso, but I thank them for doing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 9, line 1.

Mr. OVERMAN. At that point the committee offers an amendment reducing the appropriation, in line 22, page 8, from $200,000 to $150,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 22, strike out "$200,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

> To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $150,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this object for the fiscal year 1917, which is hereby reappropriated and made available for this purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question. I notice here an item for ground rent at Tokyo. I had an impression that our Government owned the embassy there.

Mr. OVERMAN. We own the building, but we could not buy the land. We have a lease. The plot was leased to us for a nominal sum as ground rent. That language has occurred in this bill for years and years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a mere matter of form?

Mr. OVERMAN. They declined to give us a fee, but I think our lease is for 99 years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator that that ground rent is exceedingly low. The grounds are very large; they are quite extensive.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand the ground rent is very reasonable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is exceedingly so. The ground is located almost within the heart of the city, and it occupies perhaps the space of an acre or an acre and a half.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood that this land was to be conveyed to our Government; that it was made as an evidence of friendship and good will on the part of Japan; and that for years we have been occupying it as our own. If, however, because of any technical objection to taking the absolute title, we are holding it under a leasehold estate, this provision of course would be necessary and perfectly proper.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Evidently the Tokyo Government and the Washington Government agreed to this rental of $250 per annum, for this item has been in every diplomatic and consular bill for years.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead, "Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service," on page 9, line 1, after the word "purpose," to insert:

Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law—

So as to make the clause read:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $200,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this object for the fiscal year 1917, which is hereby reappropriated and made available for this purpose: Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to see this bill go through, and I do not care to delay it by discussion. Therefore I make the point of order against this proviso that it is clearly general legislation and that it repeals existing law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is a limitation on the appropriation and provides how the money shall be spent. If it is a violation of existing law or any change of existing law, I will admit that the Senator from Massachusetts is correct and that his point of order is well taken.

Mr. LODGE. The proviso reads, "Notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law."

Mr. OVERMAN. I know those words are there, and if the Senator can show me that there is any such existing law I will agree that his point is correct.

Mr. LODGE. I could show the Senator, but I do not want to take the time to do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not wish the Senator to take the time.

Mr. LODGE. This provision for $200,000 is for money to be used in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and for "the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act." It is purely a secret-service fund. It is the only money of which I know appropriated under this Government which can be spent on the voucher of the Secretary of State and where there is a particular exemption from any itemized return. This is a proposition to permit this money to be spent in any way that the Executive chooses, without regard to that statute. It is wholly new legislation, because this is a special fund.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, the only provision I can find in the existing law on the subject is the following:

No money appropriated in any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1917 for the payment of personal services in the departments at Washington.

But that was only the existing law, as I understand, so far as the appropriation bill for 1917 was concerned.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the President of the United States could not spend this money. If he could spend it now under existing law, there would be no need of this proviso.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Massachusetts has reference to the general law passed in relation to the spending of money appropriated for purposes outside of the District of Columbia being expended in the District, but this provision says "to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes." I think clearly the Senator from Massachusetts is right in his contention that the amendment is a change of existing law, and that his point of order is well taken.

I desire to say to the Senator that I am bitterly opposed to any such provision as this on appropriation bills generally. I was opposed to this provision in the committee and voted against it, but there is a reason for this provision on this particular appropriation bill. I will say to the Senator—though I suppose it would hardly be proper to refer to particular cases that were called to the attention of the committee by the State Department——

Mr. LODGE. I know what those purposes are.

Mr. SMOOT. But even in the case of the commission appointed for the consideration of the Mexican situation——

Mr. LODGE. Let them ask for appropriations for it in the proper way.

Mr. SMOOT. I perfectly agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not like this kind of legislation on any bill, I do not care what that bill may be. The point of order, in my opinion, is well taken.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as to the change of existing law, of course, the bill shows on its face that the provision is made to avoid existing law, which is stated in the paragraph itself. I only wanted to call attention to the peculiar nature of the appropriation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not propose now to discuss the merits of the matter, because, if the Senator is correct in his contention, the amendment is in violation of the rules; but I can not understand where it is in violation of any existing law.

Mr. LODGE. It is in violation of the law stated in this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to read the statute.

Mr. LODGE. I do not refer to that section. That is the section which provides how the money shall be spent; the law is to enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service; that is the law to-day, and it has been the law for years, including "the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act."

Mr. OVERMAN. There is nothing in the law that prevents the President from expending the money in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. If there is nothing in the law to prevent such expenditure, then there is no necessity for the proviso.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but there has been time and time again put into the law a proviso that certain appropriations should not be expended in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE. The purpose of this provision is to put a great sum of money—the only sum of money that can be spent merely on vouchers—in the hands of the Executive to spend on vouchers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; he wants to spend it in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly; without making an itemized return.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is a secret fund.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly; and he wants to spend the Secret Service fund in the District of Columbia for personal services.

Mr. OVERMAN. Some part of it, he does, to aid him in carrying out the execution of the laws.

Mr. LODGE. There is nothing to prevent his spending it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not going into the discussion of the merits of the case. I simply wish to call the attention of the Presiding Officer to section 291 of the Revised Statutes, page 49, of which this proviso is amendatory, which section reads:

SEC. 291. Whenever any sum of money has been or shall be issued from the Treasury for the purposes of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations in pursuance of any law the President is authorized to cause the same to be duly settled annually with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury by causing the same to be accounted for, specifically, if the expenditure may in his judgment be made public, and by making or causing the Secretary of State to make a certificate of the amount of such expenditure as he may think it advisable not to specify, and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum therein expressed to have been expended.

There is nothing in the language as to where the money shall be expended, whether in the District of Columbia or outside of the District. So I contend there is no change in existing law, but if the Senator can cite me to any change in existing law I will agree with him at once as to his point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I gave the impression that the amendment was a change of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, I did not so intend. I referred to section 291 as showing the peculiar character of the law. Now, for every purpose of the Secret Service, whether in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, or for diplomatic emergencies, this money can be spent in the District of Columbia or anywhere else; but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. It can not, however, be spent under existing law to pay the salaries of commissioners, and we ought to know what appropriations are made for matters which should go through the regular course. This proviso is to get rid of the laws protecting the expenditure of the public appropriations; that is the purpose; and it changes the law in regard to this peculiar Secret Service fund.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator point me to the law to which he refers?

Mr. LODGE. The law is in this statute right before us.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What statute? This act?

Mr. LODGE. It is written in this appropriation bill. That is the law to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not the law until we pass it.

Mr. LODGE. No; but it is the law under the last diplomatic appropriation act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The last act applied to the then appropriation, and we are not proposing to change it under this bill.

Mr. LODGE. The last act—and I should think the Senator would know it—is the law until the 30th of June next.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Precisely.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. It is the law of the country to-day. This is an effort to get hold of the secret-service fund and spend it for purposes which ought to be returned in due course. I have no objection to voting money to pay the Mexican Commission, but I object to having it done out of the secret-service fund.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire to be misunderstood. I am not expressing my approval of this provision. I will not vote to appropriate $200,000, to be spent by anybody in the District of Columbia, without the requirement of a report and without knowing how it is to be spent. I entirely disapprove this proviso, and shall not support it; but what I meant was this: I think the Senator from Massachusetts goes too far when he undertakes to say that the appropriation——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment, let me finish—that the appropriation act of last year appropriating $200,000, and specifying the way in which that money should be expended, becomes a part of the general law of the land. The limitation on our appropriation bills is that where a general statute is in force fixing the rule of law as one of general conduct, we can not change it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President. Now, if the Senator will allow me, what we are changing by this provision is not only existing law as contained in the last Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, but we are changing all the laws which require accounting. It is proposed that the money here appropriated shall not be subject to the laws which require itemized accounting for all appropriations. The proviso would not be there if it were not necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator can call my attention to the statute which provides that, with the exception of this kind of an appropriation, all expenditures shall be accounted for in a certain way, then I will agree that is a general law and this amendment would be subject to the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. The laws providing for accounting, the laws against exceeding the amount appropriated, the laws in relation to auditing, and the laws for submitting questions to the comptrollers go back in our general legislation to the foundation of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. They cover the whole system of governmental accounting. This item proposes that this money shall not be subject to the general system of governmental accounting.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there a provision of law limiting the expenditure of this $200,000 to places outside of the District of Columbia?

Mr. LODGE. It is limited by section 291, which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has read. That is what gives this particular appropriation its peculiar character. It is the fund that was known in our early history as the "Mediterranean fund," which was used to buy from the Barbary pirates safety for our ships in the Mediterranean. The Secretary of State has always necessarily had to have a fund at his disposition that did not have to be accounted for under the general laws requiring itemized accounting and submission to the auditors. The statute books abound with those laws.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not in favor of extending the privilege of spending this $200,000 in the District of Columbia without an accounting.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment bears on its face the evidence that it is general legislation, because the money is to be accounted for by voucher, not by itemized statement. All the Secretary of State has to do is to sign a voucher that the money has been spent by him. He does not have to give the purpose of its expenditure; he does not have to give any name. It is a secret-service fund, and the object is to have this secret-service fund so that it can be spent for objects which ought to be accounted for and as to which there is no reason why an accounting should not be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I agree with the view of the Senator from Massachusetts that the privilege of spending this $200,000 in the District ought not to be given except according to the general rules provided for domestic expenditures.

Mr. LODGE. How can the proposed amendment fail to be otherwise than general legislation when it says "notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law"? It appears on its face that it is existing law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It might say, "that being the general law which is hereby superseded," but if there were not a general law that would not be true.

Mr. LODGE. Ah, Mr. President, those words are never used without a purpose.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, just let me ask the Senator from Georgia, who is a lawyer, a legal question. I will ask him what is the necessity for this provision if it is not to avoid the requirement of some existing law? If it does not do so, then the amendment is not needed and the $200,000 can be used as desired without it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the provision itself designates the way in which it is to be used.

Mr. FALL. Let us have it read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will read it. It is as follows:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $200,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this object for the fiscal year 1917, which is hereby reappropriated and made available for this purpose.

I should like to hear read section 291 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I read that a few moments ago.

Mr. FALL. But in the meantime, in answer to my question, will not the Senator from Georgia proceed with the reading of this proviso?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly. The proviso reads:

Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law.

I think the presumption would be from the language used that the writer thought there was an existing law in the way, and that the object of that proviso was to get rid of existing law.

Mr. FALL. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I did was to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he would call my attention to the existing law.

Mr. FALL. And what I did was to ask the Senator, as a lawyer, if he does not think, then, that this amendment is subject to the objection made by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not necessarily from its own language; but actually and certainly objectionable if it does change existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Pardon me. If the Senator will turn to Chapter IV, in which section 291 occurs——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. LODGE. It is a long chapter and contains many sections prescribing the powers of the auditors; but section 291 was incorporated in that chapter in order to take this particular fund out of the jurisdiction of the auditor, as all other public money has to pass through the hands of the auditor. That is the law that this provision is to avoid, among others; and there are many others.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. According to that, the Senator would strike out the whole section and not appropriate anything.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the accounts go to the auditor, the Secretary of State will not be able to spend a cent under the appropriation. The whole paragraph, without the proviso, will allow him to spend it outside of Washington without going before the auditor.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all. The section of the appropriation bill brings the matter specifically within section 291; and the purpose of this amendment is to take that money, which is specificially for that purpose under section 291, and use it for other purposes, which ought to be accounted for under the ordinary laws of accounting.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the words "notwithstanding the provisions of existing law" are usual words, but they really have no place here.

Mr. LODGE. Then, drop them.

Mr. OVERMAN. The words are:

Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law.

I do not know of any existing law——

Mr. LODGE. Then, drop the proviso out.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to strike out the words "notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law."

Mr. FALL. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Just one moment, please. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I have concluded, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. Then, let me ask the Senator from North Carolina, who has charge of the bill, a question.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Can the President, under existing law, use any part of the $200,000 for the purposes expressed in the proviso?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the very point I make. Now, if the Senator or anybody else can show me any statute——

Mr. FALL. The Senator is asking a question now. I am asking the Senator a question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know of no such law; and I say that if the Senator who makes the point of order can show any law I will yield at once, because it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. I have shown pages of law—endless pages of law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, let us take a ruling on it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think everybody has been talking without recognition, and I will proceed now. I am very thankful to get it. I think I should have received it before.

I want to call attention to the fact that even though this does change existing law it is not subject to a point of order, as I understand it, because there is not any rule of the Senate that I know of——

Mr. LODGE. It is general legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator has not made the point that it is general legislation.

Mr. LODGE. I made that precise point. The Chair will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. NORRIS. All right, then; if the Senator makes it on that ground he is mistaken. It is not general legislation. This particular change, while I think the man who wrote it intended that it should and believed that it would change existing law, does not provide for general legislation. The Vice President has very frequently decided that a change of law that does not amount to general legislation is not such a change under our rules as will make the provision subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will. The rule provides:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant—

And so forth. The law this particular provision changes is the provision contained in the part of the bill making this appropriation of $200,000. It is limited to this particular appropriation, and to the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. It seems to me, therefore, that in no sense could it be considered general legislation. It applies only to this appropriation. It is limited to this.

Now I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am, of course, aware that the House rule is "changing existing law" and ours is "general legislation." I cited the change of existing law simply because it is a characteristic of general legislation to repeal a general law. The laws which this repeals pro tanto are all legislation of the most general character.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but this does not repeal them.

Mr. LODGE. I insist that it does.

Mr. NORRIS. Only to the extent of this appropriation, and only for the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. From what little I know about the matter I am rather in sympathy with what has been said against the amendment; but it does not seem to me, notwithstanding that, that it is subject to the point of order that is made against it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I assume that this discussion, since it arises upon a point of order, is addressed to the Chair rather than to the Senate; but I should like some information about this matter from either the Senator having the bill in charge or the Senator from Massachusetts, who seems to be unusually well informed upon this subject.

As I read this provision, it simply contemplates the expenditure of some of this money in the District of Columbia. Were it not for the provision, I assume that there would be some obstacle in law to the expenditure of any portion of it in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I can settle this thing at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield, and to whom?

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will yield, I find the statute that I asked the Senator to show me. I was rather inclined to think that there was not such a statute; but I find that the act of August 5, 1882, provides:

That no civil officer, clerk, draftsman, copyist, messenger, assistant messenger, mechanic, watchman, laborer, or other employee shall after the 1st day of October next be employed in any of the executive departments or subordinate bureaus or offices thereof at the seat of government except only at such rates and in such numbers, respectively, as may be specifically appropriated for by Congress for such clerical and other personal services for each fiscal year; and no civil officer, clerk, draftsman, copyist, messenger, assistant messenger, mechanic, watchman, laborer, or other employee shall hereafter be employed at the seat of government in any executive department or subordinate bureau or office thereof or be paid from any appropriation made for contingent expenses, or for any specific or general purpose, unless such employment is authorized and payment therefor specifically provided in the law granting the appropriation.

Therefore I say it is against the rule, and I will let it go out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not want to let the opportunity pass to say that according to my observation there has been no more consistent advocate of the very rule he has just applied than the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. He has insisted from first to last that there should be no general legislation on appropriation bills. His motion to strike out this limitation is in harmony with his record, and is very gratifying.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say one thing more with reference to this matter while we are on it. The privilege of putting in the appropriation bill that part of the act contained from line 16 down through the balance of the page grows out of section 291, which limits the use of the money to the purposes of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations. It authorizes the appropriation for that purpose, and when used for that purpose allows the Secretary of State to make a certificate of the amount of such expenditure, and takes it out of the general rule subjecting all appropriations to audit and detailed control. When the use of the funds passes beyond intercourse or treaty with a foreign nation, then the exception ceases, and it falls within the general provision of the law applicable to all appropriations of Congress. It is therefore clear that the general law, not the appropriation bill, subjects all expenditures to detailed audit except in the cases covered by section 291, and this only extends the use to "purposes of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations." The proviso clearly seeks to extend the use beyond that permitted by the general law, and I do not doubt the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. LODGE. I may say that merely striking out the words "notwithstanding existing law" does not affect the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has sustained the point of order. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 13, after line 8, to insert:

SECOND PAN AMERICAN FINANCIAL CONFERENCE.

The President is authorized to extend to the Governments of Central and South America an invitation to be represented by their ministers of finance and leading bankers, not exceeding three in number in each case, to attend the Second Pan American Financial Conference in the city of Washington, at such date as shall be determined by the President, with a view to carrying on the work initiated at the First Pan American Financial Conference and establishing closer and more satisfactory financial relations between their countries and the United States of America, and authority is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to invite, in his discretion, representative citizens of the United States to participate in the said conference, and for the purpose of meeting such actual and necessary expenses as may be incidental to the meeting of said conference and for the entertainment of the foreign delegates during the conference, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 10, to strike out:

NINETEENTH CONFERENCE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION.

The appropriation of $10,000 "For the purpose of defraying the expenses in Washington City incident to the Nineteenth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union to be held in Washington in 1915, to be expended uder such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe," made in the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and extended and made available for the calendar years 1916 and 1917 by the Diplomatic and Consular act approved July 1, 1916, is hereby extended and made available for the calendar year 1918: Provided, That said sum may, in the discretion of the Secretary of State, be expended within the United States, but not elsewhere: Provided further, That an itemized account of all expenditures shall be reported to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 5, to strike out:

FIFTEENTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS AGAINST ALCOHOLISM.

To complete the arrangements and provide for the entertainment of the Fifteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism to be held in the United States, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, together with the unexpended balance of previous appropriations for the holding of said congress in the United States: Provided, That an itemized account of all expenditures shall be reported to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Post allowances to consular and diplomatic officers," on page 24, line 24, after the word "officers," to insert "in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 21, to strike out:

ACQUISITION OF LEGATION PREMISES AT MANAGUA, NICARAGUA.

For the purchase of the grounds and buildings known as Quinta Nina at the city of Managua, Nicaragua, and for such alteration, repair, and furnishing of the same as may be necessary for the use of the legation to Nicaragua, both as a residence of the minister and for the office of the legation, and for the erection on the premises of suitable quarters for the legation guard, $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no further amendment is proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 3 hours and 30 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

NOMINATION OF WINTHROP M. DANIELS.

During the consideration of executive business,

On motion of Mr. HUGHES, and by unanimous consent, the injunction of secrecy was removed from Miscellaneous Executive Document No. 2 and Miscellaneous Executive Document No. 3, and they were ordered to be printed as Senate documents and also in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate executive session, Misc. Ex. Doc. No. 2, 64th Cong., 2d sess.]

[S. Doc. No. 673.]

WINTHROP M. DANIELS.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES ON JANUARY 3 AND 6, 1917, IN OPPOSITION TO THE CONFIRMATION OF THE NOMINATION OF WINTHROP MORE DANIELS, TO BE A MEMBER OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, BY HON. ALBERT B. CUMMINS, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM IOWA.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the confirmation of Winthrop M. Daniels as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. My opposition is entirely impersonal. I am not acquainted with the nominee and know nothing whatsoever about him, except as his views and tendencies are disclosed in his record; first, as a member of the Board of Public Utilities of New Jersey; and second, as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not question his intellectual strength and accomplishments. I have no reason to doubt his general integrity. My objection is based wholly upon his unfitness for the particular office which he has filled for the last two years and a half, and to which he is now nominated for the full term of seven years. Before I have finished I will state specifically the reasons which, in my judgment, disqualify him for the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but at the very outset I desire to express my opinion respecting the supreme importance attaching to the action of the Senate upon his nomination.

I believe that we have reached the parting of the ways. I believe that our system of the control and regulation of common carriers is on final trial, and that if the commission is to be made up of men of Mr. Daniel's trend of mind the system must be abandoned. For one, I have no hesitation in declaring that if his views are to prevail I am for absolute and immediate Government ownership and operation of our transportation facilities. If the charges for service rendered by our public carriers are to increase year after year in the rapid ratio which the principles he advocates will not only authorize but require, the burden, now heavy, will become insupportable. If his economic opinions are to become the settled law on the subject, there is no relief save through the abolition of private ownership. To insist that he honestly holds these opinions simply emphasizes and intensifies the wrong and converts what might be a temporary evil into a permanent injustice. If the Senate confirms the nomination of this man it will be notice to the people that we approve the course he has marked out for the regulation of public utilities, and we may be altogether certain that it is a course which will be condemned by an overwhelming majority of those whose interests are deliberately ignored.

The duty I am about to perform is not an agreeable one, and I am perfectly conscious that it is not an easy one. It will be said in every variety of phrase that I am assailing the nominee simply because I do not agree with his decisions, and that it is unfair and ungenerous to object to a confirmation because of such differences of opinion. It will be asserted, I know, that every officer of the Government who acts in a judicial or quasi judicial capacity should be independent and express in his decisions his honest convictions. I agree that every man in such a position should be sincere and record his conscience in every judgment; but that does not touch the point. If his mind is so warped that he is incapable of administering the law in an unprejudiced way, he ought not to be given the opportunity to pervert the principles which underlie the subject or to destroy the policy which the common justice of mankind has established.

For instance, I have great admiration for Theodore Roosevelt, but it could hardly be said that he would be acceptable as an arbitrator between Germany and Great Britain. There is no man in the Senate in whose honor and integrity I have more implicit confidence than the senior Senator from New Jersey, but I would hesitate a long time before I could bring myself to put the administration of a prohibition law in his hands. These illustrations could be multiplied indefinitely, and they teach us that there are some men who, by their training and trend of thought, have wholly disqualified themselves for certain offices. This is the category in which I put Mr. Daniels, and while the Senate may try to take him out of it, the effort in the end will be a dismal failure.

In the exercise of those prophetic powers which every man of common sense enjoys I predict that before long we will either have an Interstate Commerce Commission made up of men who look upon the subject intrusted to them from a different standpoint than the one occupied by Mr. Daniels, or the commission will be abolished.

It is worth while to recall just what authority Congress has conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and what its duties, broadly speaking, are.

Section 1 provides:

"All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property, and for the transmission of messages by telegraph, telephone, or cable, as aforesaid or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service or any part thereof, is prohibited and declared to be unlawful."

Section 3 provides:

"That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic to any undue or any unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever."

These are the generic rules to be enforced by the commission, and the entire act and all its amendments, comprising something like 60 printed pages, gathers round these fundamental declarations.

The commission is organized and exists for the purpose of compelling each such common carrier to exact for its service just and reasonable compensation, and to render its service without unreasonable preference or advantage as between localities, kinds of traffic, and persons. The details of the law adopted to carry into effect these vital commands and prohibitions are not material to the present inquiry. There is, however, one amendment intended to aid in the ascertainment of just and reasonable charges which should be borne in mind. I refer to the act approved March 1, 1913, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof by providing for the valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto, and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities."

This amendment was for the purpose of furnishing certain information respecting the value of property of common carriers. It authorizes and requires the commission, first, to make an inventory of all the property of every common carrier subject to the provisions of the interstate commerce act, and show the value thereof, and to classify the physical property in accordance with established rules. Second, with respect to each piece of property owned and used for common carrier purposes, the original cost to date, the cost of reproduction, less depreciation, and an analysis of the methods by which these several costs are obtained and the reason for their differences, if any. In like manner to ascertain and report separately their values and elements of value, if any, of the property, and an analysis of the methods of valuation employed, and of the reasons for any difference between such value, and each of the foregoing cost values.

Much other information is required, but it is not necessary to recite the further provisions of the amendment.

The effect of the work of the commission under the amendment is thus stated:

"All physical valuations by the commission and the classification thereof shall be published, and shall be prima facie evidence of the value of the property in all proceedings under the act to regulate commerce as of the date of the findings thereof, and in all judicial proceedings for the enforcement of the act approved February 4, 1887, commonly known as 'An act to regulate commerce' and the various acts amendatory thereof, and in all judicial proceedings brought to annul, set aside, or suspend in whole or in part any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

The ultimate purpose of the amendment was to give the commission and the courts authority to fix the standard by which rates, whether published by the carriers or promulgated by the commission, could be measured; that is to say, a value by which the adequacy or inadequacy of rates to provide a fair return could be at least in part determined.

When it is remembered that the carriers claim the aggregate value of the property to be considerably more than $20,000,000,000, the overshadowing importance of the power here conferred upon the commission becomes so apparent that no comment is necessary.

It may be well, however, to mention one phase of our system of regulation which may have escaped the present attention of Senators. The carriers have the constitutional right, and it is fully recognized and provided for in the interstate commerce act, to appeal to the courts if any order of the commission reduces their compensation below the constitutional limit or otherwise infringes their constitutional privileges. The public—that is to say, those who receive the service and pay the compensation—have no such right, and they must abide by the judgment of the commission. For them the commission is the tribunal of final resort, and if injustice be inflicted they must suffer without a remedy.

I am not criticizing the act in this, because it is necessary. We can not give the shipper the right to assail orders of the commission without imposing upon the courts the duty of determining reasonable rates for the future; in other words, without attempting to confer jurisdiction to try a case de novo upon its merits. In my opinion it would be unwise to transfer to the courts this jurisdiction, even if we could do so; but it is quite clear that we can not, under the Constitution, confer upon the courts the authority to perform what is essentially a legislative act.

I mention this in order to emphasize the degree of care we ought to exercise in selecting members of the commission and to fasten upon the minds of Senators a due sense of the tremendous responsibility which they must bear when they pass upon the qualifications of persons who are to rule in such a domain.

One further thought and I shall have concluded these preliminary observations.

I have already mentioned the magnitude of the property used in transportation, and it must have occurred to you that a very small percentage of unjust advance in this vast sum will impose a heavy burden upon the people during all the years to come, for upon any such advance the public must pay a yearly return of 6, 8, or 10 per cent. I now remind you that the Interstate Commerce Commission has just issued a statement indicating that the gross operating revenue of this property for the last calendar year amounts to more than $3,500,000,000. I hope you will not forget as I proceed that an increase of 5 per cent in the charges for transportation will take from the public the staggering sum of $175,000,000 annually. I allude to these things because we are dealing with a subject so big that it demands the most alert intellect to fully comprehend its proportions.

Having pointed out, with commendable brevity I hope, the gravity of the question before us, and outlined the character and extent of the powers and duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission, I turn now to the men to whom we are asked to commit these powers and upon whom we are asked to impose these duties.

He was at one time a member of the Board of Public Utilities Commissioners of the State of New Jersey, and he has been for something like two years and a half a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. He was a dominating force on the New Jersey board, and has been, I think, the controlling influence on the Federal tribunal. His activity in both positions has been conspicuous, and his prominence in the decisions of these governmental bodies is easily seen.

It is not my purpose to review more than two cases for the result of which he is partly or wholly responsible. I select these cases because they deal with the fundamentals of regulation, and announce with the utmost emphasis the principles which must underlie all efforts to restrain charges for public services within reasonable limits. If they are sound and correct principles the mere failure to properly apply them to the facts of a given case would not disturb me at all, for I was too long at the bar to be surprised or discouraged with the wide differences of opinion in that field.

The first case to be examined is "In the Matter of the Hearing as to Whether the Existing Schedule of Rates of the Public Service Gas Co. for Gas is Just and Reasonable." (Third Annual Report of the Board of Public Utility Commissioners of the State of New Jersey, pp. 246–310.)

The investigation was made by the Public Utility Commissioners of New Jersey, and related to what is known as the Passaic division of the gas company. The decision is most elaborate, occupying 64 printed pages, and is so well composed and so very lucid that it is impossible to mistake its import or effect. Considered simply as a decision of a particular case it is of little importance, but looked upon as a disclosure of Mr. Daniels's convictions upon the subject of reasonable rates for a public service, and his closely reasoned opinion with regard to the value of property rendering a public service, it is conclusive as to his utter unfitness to assume the power of fixing rates of transportation in the United States.

It may be recalled that when Mr. Daniels's nomination was originally before the Senate I earnestly opposed its confirmation, and the decision in the New Jersey Gas Co. case was the basis of my opposition. Upon this occasion I will try to deal with it upon the assumption that many Senators will remember the argument then made, but knowing that other great subjects have engrossed the Senate in the last two and a half years, and knowing also how easy it is to forget in the midst of our rushing duties, I intend to recall this decision in sufficient detail to be sure that its meaning is firmly in your minds.

Lest I may be accused of concealing an important thing, I say in the very beginning of the review that the Public Service Gas Co. had established a rate of $1.10 per thousand cubic feet of gas, with a rebate or deduction of 10 cents per thousand for prompt payment. Upon the inquiry the rate was reduced to 90 cents per thousand cubic feet, but whether any deduction for prompt payment was permitted is not entirely clear, although as I construe the order it established a flat rate.

It was believed by the commissioners that this rate would yield an annual return of 8 per cent upon the value of the property as fixed by the commissioners. I have heard, though not authentically enough to submit it as a fact, that the return in the years that have elapsed since the decision has been very much larger than 8 per cent. However that may be I do not look upon it as at all material.

The 64 pages upon which the decision is published are almost wholly devoted to the ascertainment of the value of the property and the announcement of the rules governing investigations of that character. Roughly speaking, the tangible property could be divided into two classes: First, the real estate; second, the structures of various kinds built upon the real estate, or upon or in the streets and public places of the several municipalities. The value adopted for the real estate was $111,160, and while I am not ready to concede the correctness of the rule laid down, the item is of minor importance. The structures upon and in the ground were then considered. I do not care to detain the Senate with an analysis of the rather curious process adopted to reach the result as to the value of these structures as such. I note only that the cost of reproduction seems to be the guiding rule.

The point I desire to make, and it is here that a fatal departure from sound principles was first made, is that after ascertaining the value of all structures as such there was added 17.6 per cent for indefinite expenditures called "overhead charges." This addition amounted in the aggregate to $542,774.46, which in this small enterprise was forever imposed upon these communities as a public debt. It is only fair that the reasoning of the commissioners upon this item be stated. I quote from page 263 of the Third Annual Report of the Board of Public Utility Commissioners of the State of New Jersey:

"To the estimate of bare cost there must be added certain allowances for expenditures generally called overhead charges. Forstall's appraisal included a total allowance of 15.54 per cent; Randolph allowed 20 per cent; Stone & Webster, 20.5 per cent; Humphrey & Miller allowed approximately 21.7 per cent. Forstall had, however, stated that an additional 2 per cent ought to be added to the allowance. This is best explained by quoting from the letter transmitting his proposal to the board. It runs as follows: 'In these charges we cover only engineering and supervision, commissions, contingencies, and interest during construction. We have taken engineering and supervision at 5 per cent. Omissions, in view of the careful inventory, at only 2 per cent, and contingencies at 2 per cent. The allowance for interest is based upon a period for and a progress of construction that would call for an average payment of interest at the rate of 6 per cent for one year on the total amount expended. It will be seen that the overhead charges applied do not include any organization expenses, liability for accidents, and damages during construction, nor taxes during construction. Without the value of the land and the uncertainty as to the extent of the liability for accident under the existing laws, we have not felt able to fix a definite percentage for the omitted items, but think that they should amount to at least 2 per cent of the total before any overhead charges are applied.'

"Eleven per cent should, therefore, be added before computing the interest at 6 per cent, this making a total of 17.6 per cent.

"After due consideration we accept this figure as the fairest estimate for these allowances, and apply it in connection with each class of property."

This was said and the thing was done, notwithstanding the fact that not a word of testimony had been introduced showing that the company had ever made any such expenditures or that any such capital remained idle during any such period.

This was said and the thing was done, notwithstanding the perfectly obvious truth that the company or its predecessors had been making and selling gas for many years, had been charging exorbitant prices for it, and that whatever expenditures had been made or whatever idle capital to be rewarded the earnings of the company had been ample to cover, and had covered all such items.

Under such circumstances the addition of 17.6 per cent to the actual value of the property; to require the people of these communities to pay for all time 8 per cent upon the imaginary value of $542,774 was so flagrantly wrong that I for one am not willing to give Mr. Daniels the power which will enable him to apply the rule to the property of the carriers of the country. In these days $542,764 does not seem to be a very large sum of money; but suppose Mr. Daniels is permitted to add under similar circumstances 17.6 per cent on account of these fugitive overhead charges to all the structures, improvements, equipment, and facilities of the railway companies. Instead of a half million wrongfully added to the value of the gas property we will have billions wrongfully added to the value of the railway property, and it will not be long until that very question will be presented to Mr. Daniels for decision if he continues to be a member of the commission.

I will not dwell longer upon the addition of an intangible 17.6 per cent to the real value of structures lest the impression be created that this addition is the chief mistake of the decision. It is bad enough, but it is only the beginning. It simply opens the door into a broader field of error. The utility commissioners found that the value of the real estate and the structures with the 17.6 per cent added was $3,737,980. They then added $250,000 for working capital, although there was no showing that in actual experience any such amount was in fact used. I make no complaint of the allowance, however, for the mistake shrinks into insignificance when we come to consider the next step. The aggregate of all these items of property, including real estate, working capital, and the 17.6 per cent overhead charges, was found to be $3,987,980. It would seem that the gas company ought to have been content with this swollen valuation; but not so. It presented another item classified as "Other intangible gas capital," and under this head the commissioners considered the subject of "Going value" or "Going concern value." The discussion of this item, long and labored, stands alone in all the literature of rate regulation. It fills 12 pages of the opinion (278–289, inclusive). The outcome of the reasoning was an allowance of $1,025,000 for "Going value," substantially 30 per cent of the structural value with the 17.6 per cent added. This extraordinary process brought the valuation up to $5,012,980, which sum, after a deduction of $62,000 for expenditures after the date of the examination and $200,980 for depreciation, left $4,750,000 as the value for the determination of a yearly return.

In order to show just what was accomplished in this performance I recapitulate: The value of the property, including real estate and working capital, but excluding the intangible 17.6 per cent and the intangible $1,025,000, was $3,182,326, as against $4,750,000 which the commissioners made the basis for return. That is to say, the gas company was allowed rates that would exact a yearly return upon $1,567,774 in this small affair in excess of the actual worth of the property and in excess of any independent investment in it. I shall presently consider the reasonableness of the rate of return, which was 8 per cent, but at this moment I content myself by calling attention to the fact that assuming the rate fixed would yield no more than 8 per cent per annum, this intangible allowance has cost, and will continue to cost for all time, the people of those communities $125,411 per year.

I go back now to a brief examination of the reasons given by the commissioners for the extraordinary allowance of $1,025,000 as "Going value." They quote first the definition of the terms proposed by counsel for the gas company, viz, "Value of the plant and business as a whole in excess of the value of the special franchise and cost of the tangible plant" (p. 278). They quote the definition of a witness, Mr. Forstall, viz, "Development value, the cost of getting the business and development charge * * * the excess of a gas property in operation as over a similar gas property with the same or similar structures, but without consumers attached" (p. 278). And they finally say, "This is the value a utility property has or may have over and above the value of its tangible belongings" (p. 278). Again (p. 279), "the 'Going-concern value' will then be largely represented by the cost of developing the business as distinct from the cost of securing the physical structure."

After these somewhat vague suggestions and definitions the commissioners proceed to the allowance of the substantial average of the opinions of a series of the witnesses whose estimates are absolutely arbitrary and seem to grow out of the experiences of the industrial enterprises from which they came. They made no inquiry whatever into the expenditures actually made by the gas company in securing or developing the business it then had, although they assume that these expenditures had been made as a part of the operating cost of the plant as it gradually grew.

I do not intend to discuss at length the soundness of admitting any intangible item in the valuation of public utility property, although my personal opinion is unalterably against it. I recognize that in the beginning and throughout the whole career of a public service corporation there are expenditures which must be met in order to develop the business which can not be made a part of the value of any particular physical structure. I recognize that for these expenditures the corporation must be reimbursed, either from a capital fund or from the fund for operation and maintenance. They properly belong to the latter and are usually made good from it. If they are taken from independent capital, I agree that they should enter the basis on which a return is to be computed. They have, however, nothing whatever to do with the value of the property, and before any allowance is made for them it must be shown that they were in fact made; and it must be further shown that they were not, as they should be, part of the cost of operation and maintenance. It is assumed in the decision of the New Jersey commissioners that the cost of developing the business was paid from the revenue of the company, but nevertheless such cost was not only treated as capital but was made a part of the value of the physical structures. The reasoning of the commissioners upon this point deserves attention. I quote from page 279, et seq.:

"The second query raised asks whether such 'Going concern value' should be included in the basis on which public utilities are entitled to a fair return in case the costs involved in developing such 'Going concern value' have been made out of rates exacted from consumers To this our answer also is in the affirmative, so far as it does not appear that the rates exacted from the consumers were legally challenged. If in the past this gas company out of the rates exacted from consumers had made its operating expenses and depreciation, and in addition thereto had obtained enough to pay returns to investors and to build an actual structure used in the business, would this structure aforesaid be a lawful property of the company? The answer it seems to us must be in the affirmative. If the company had paid out, in addition to other payments to investors, dividends equal to the cost of building this structure, and then had issued additional stock in value equal to the cost of this structure in order to repossess itself of the money required to build it, there can be no doubt that the structure built out of the proceeds of the additional securities thus sold would be the lawful property of the company. It would be none the less the company's lawful property if built out of current earnings without the issue of additional securities."

This is the technical analysis resorted to by the commissioners to justify their action. It is utterly unsound; but even if it were approved it would not follow that money paid out for advertising, solicitation, and the like would be properly chargeable to the same account as money paid out for the construction of a new building. To me it is monstrous to assert that the customary expenditures of a public-service company, made in the effort to enlarge its business from a fund created by its ordinary operating revenues where revenues are sufficient after paying all these expenses to reward capital with a due return, are to be made the basis of a "going value" of practically one-third the value of all tangible property. I repudiate the whole theory. It is vicious from every standpoint. It is the corner stone of the overcapitalization which now menaces all of our attempts in the regulation of common carriers. The speculators who ruined the Chicago & Alton Railroad had just the same idea of public-utility economics when they substantially trebled the capitalization of the railroad company, adding but a few millions to the actual property. They examined the books which recorded a long and honorable business and capitalized the sums which had been paid out of revenues in the betterment of the railroad, and in a few months a road which had been highly successful for more than a quarter of a century was absolutely insolvent.

If Mr. Daniels, in his place as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, should be able to apply the rule which he tried to defend in the Gas Co. case, the consequences would be more than disastrous; they would be terrifying. Imagine, if you can, what would happen if there should be added to the value of the physical property of the railways, first, an arbitrary overhead charge of 17.8 per cent, and then crown his work by superimposing upon the whole mammoth sum a "going value" of 30 per cent. We know that a large part of the present capitalization of the railway corporations was issued without consideration, but if Mr. Daniels's plan for valuation should be adopted I venture to predict that the basis for rate making would exceed the existing capitalization by more than $6,000,000,000. Those who become responsible for giving a man, however talented, an opportunity to work out in railway valuation these strange and extravagant opinions will never forgive themselves for the grievous error they are about to commit. As for myself, I refuse to participate in any such blunder.

I pass now to that part of the New Jersey decision which fixes the charge per thousand cubic feet which the commissioners established. I quote the last paragraph of the decision (p. 309):

"In our judgment, based on all of the evidence and consideration of all the facts, a rate of 90 cents per thousand cubic feet will furnish a fair return at not less than 8 per cent on the value of the property used and useful in supplying the customers of the Public Service Gas Co. in the Passaic division."

Mr. Daniels seems to have been of the opinion that a minimum return of 8 per cent upon the swollen and exaggerated value which I have been discussing would be just and reasonable. As I have once suggested, the rate fixed has yielded, as I am informed, greatly more than 8 per cent. But I am quite willing to judge Mr. Daniels by the standard which he had in mind. What does 8 per cent per annum upon the value as found by the commissioners mean? It sufficiently appears from the decision that one-half or more of the capitalization of this value was represented by bonds bearing interest at the rate of not more than 5 per cent per annum. If I assume that the other half was represented by capital stock, the result is a yearly dividend of 11 per cent, or a dividend of 9 per cent with 2 per cent for surplus. This goes far beyond even the claims of public-utility companies, and if Mr. Daniels finally succeeds in adjusting railway rates upon this basis, he will impose a burden upon the people of the country so heavy and unjust that instant rebellion would be the result.

I do not review the decisions of either courts or commissions respecting the proper rate of return upon capital stock, for all of you are familiar, in a general way, with them. I content myself with saying that hitherto no other tribunal has ventured to the extreme point which the New Jersey commissioners reached so easily.

With this record behind him, Mr. Daniels became, in the spring of 1914, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I propose to examine two vitally important cases in which he was the leading figure, and in which his views finally prevailed. In doing so I find it necessary to consider four great cases, epochal in their character, and which mark the beginning, progress, and end of a successful effort on the part of the railway companies to overthrow the interstate-commerce law, and to convert the commission into an instrument for the maintenance of the stock markets of the country and of fictitious values upon worthless securities.

I regret that this work has not fallen into hands more competent than mine, but, inasmuch as it is certain that it ought to be done, I intend to do it with such thoroughness as I can command and, I hope, with the utmost candor and fairness.

These cases are known in the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission as follows:

"In re Investigation of Advances in Rates by Carriers in Official Classification Territory—Eastern case. (20 I. C. C. R., 243.)

"In re Investigation of Advances in Rates by Carriers in Western Trunk Lines, Trans-Missouri and Illinois Freight Committee Territory—Western case. (20 I. C. C. R., 307.)

"In re Rates Increased in Official Classification Territory—The Five Per Cent case. (31 I. C. C. R., 351.) The rehearing of the same case. (32 I. C. C. R., 325.)

"In Western Classification Territory—Western Rate Advance case. (35 I. C. C. R., 497.)

These cases are closely connected with each other. They are chapters of an interesting although not encouraging history. A general glance toward their origin and development will be helpful in securing an understanding of their purpose and import.

In 1909 the railroads initiated a definite campaign against the Federal regulation which was originally established in 1887, and which had been materially strengthened in 1904 and 1906. The general claim was that the system was one of repression and correction, and lacked every element of sympathy or aid; that the outcome up to that time had been to deny the railroads the revenues to which they were justly entitled, to disparage and depreciate their securities in the markets of the country, and to disincline investors to embark their capital in railway enterprises. And this notwithstanding the fact that the railroads everywhere were receiving more for like service than they had received prior to the enactment of the interstate-commerce law or prior to the amendment which put an end to rebates and discriminations; that their net revenues were greater in proportion to either their capitalization or property accounts than ever before, and despite the fact that their securities had risen steadily in the markets and then commanded a much higher place than when the Government adopted its first measure of regulation.

The campaign was conducted with the greatest energy through magazines, newspapers, pamphlets, speeches, boards of trade, and all sorts of organizations. It was stimulated in a degree, no doubt, by the knowledge that Congress was about to undertake a somewhat comprehensive revision of the interstate-commerce law. That it had a profound effect upon the form of the bill which the then chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate introduced, and which was reported to the Senate, I have no doubt. Fortunately, however, the bill was so amended on the floor of the Senate that some of its most objectionable features were eliminated, and some very effective provisions added.

It will be remembered that under the law railway companies initiated their rates by filing with the Interstate Commerce Commission their tariffs. Until 1910 the only way of attacking rates was through a proceeding challenging their reasonableness, but one of the amendments of 1910 gave the commission the power to suspend new tariffs and to try them before they became effective, and in case of increased rates put the burden of proof upon the railways to establish their reasonableness.

In the spring and summer of 1910 substantially all the railway companies of the country came together and agreed that they would file similar tariffs for a general advance, and this was done. It seemed to be rather plain that this sort of action was in violation of the antitrust law, and the Attorney General instituted suits to enjoin further offenses against the law. The railroads postponed their proposed tariffs, and in the meantime the act of June 18, 1910, was passed, and under it the Interstate Commerce Commission originated an inquiry into the reasonableness of the increased rates. The investigation was divided into two cases: First, the rates in official classification territory, known as "Advances in rates"—eastern case; second, the "Advances in rates in western trunk-line, trans-Missouri, and Illinois freight committee territories," known as the western case. After exhaustive hearings and arguments both cases were decided February 22, 1911. Mr. Prouty delivered the opinion in the eastern case and Mr. Lane in the western case, and both were emphatically against the increases in rates.

The campaign, however, continued with still greater energy, and when it was believed that public sentiment had been sufficiently aroused the railway companies again attempted to accomplish the same general purpose. In 1913 the carriers in official classification territory filed tariffs proposing a general increase in freight rates ranging from 3 to 50 per cent. It was estimated that the increase in gross revenue would be substantially 5 per cent, and therefore the case is known as "The Five Per Cent case." The tariffs were suspended, and again the whole subject was examined. It was decided July 29, 1914. Lane and Prouty, who had so valiantly resisted the first attack, had ceased to be members of the commission, and Mr. Daniels had taken the place of one of them. Nevertheless, five members of the commission remained firm, and, with some proper exceptions, denied the claim of the railroads, although they opened the gate to the Trojan Horse. Here Mr. Daniels first appears. He dissented from the decision of the majority in an opinion which I shall examine later on—I am treating the matter historically just now.

The campaign proceeded until it seemed to bring under its influence all the forces of the Government. Just what effect these appeals, suggestions, and assaults from the outside had on the commission I do not know; but at any rate, the commission, led, as I believe, by Mr. Daniels, in October of the same year granted a rehearing. It was resubmitted and again decided on December 16, 1914. Three of the five members who had denied the increases in July gave way, and, following Mr. Daniels, the dissenting opinion of July became the decision of the commission in December. The increases, with some exceptions, were approved.

The first battle was won, but the campaign was still on, for the western country had still to be captured. The struggle in western classification territory continued with undiminished vigor. The case was submitted June 26, 1915, and was decided July 30, 1915.

This concludes the story of the most notable contest ever carried on in the United States. The outcome has been not only to add fifty, seventy-five, or a hundred million dollars annually to the revenues of the railway companies, but to set up a new standard for the measurement of charges for a public service; a standard not only unwarranted by the law, but directly contrary to the law—a standard which, if perpetuated, will wreck the whole system of regulation. If the outcome in the contest had been to increase railway revenues because the higher rates proposed were just and reasonable, I might differ from the commission respecting the weight of the evidence submitted, but I would not think of challenging the result. It is because Mr. Daniels, leading the commission, has ignored the law and exercised an authority which never has been and never will be conferred upon any commission, and it is because I know the fatal consequences which must follow the exercise of the authority that I am constrained to say that the man who usurped such authority ought not to be continued on the commission.

I proceed now with an analysis of these cases. I am sorry to detain the Senate for so long a time, but I can only promise that I will be as brief as is consistent with the duty I have undertaken.

Generally, let me say that for the purposes of this argument I accept every fact stated in these five decisions, in so far as it relates to the property, capitalization, earnings, and expenditures of the railway corporations under consideration, for I am judging Mr. Daniels by the record and not upon my own opinion respecting the matters I have just mentioned. Fortunately, I will have occasion to refer to but few of the statements of fact with which the decisions are crowded.

I take up, first, the Eastern case of 1910. It involved the rates in official classification territory, which, roughly speaking, is bounded on the north by Canada, on the east by the Atlantic, on the south by the Potomac and Ohio Rivers, and on the west by the Mississippi River. In this territory there are three divisions mentioned in the case, viz, New England Freight Association territory, lying east of New York; Trunk Line Association territory, lying between Buffalo, Pittsburgh, and New York; Central Freight Association territory, lying between the Mississippi River, Chicago, and Pittsburgh. The general claim of the railroads was thus stated in the opinion (p. 247):

"These advances are justified by the defendants upon the ground that the cost of operation has so increased that, although gross operating income has continued to grow, the net operating income has become and is insufficient. * * * The justification presented by the carriers is one of additional revenue, and the question presented to us is, Are these defendants justified in laying this additional transportation burden upon the public for the purpose of obtaining greater net revenue?"

The first comment, made by Commissioner Prouty, upon this contention is as follows:

"Strictly speaking, this commission has no jurisdiction to hear and determine that question. We have no authority as such to say what amount these carriers shall earn, nor to establish a schedule of rates which will permit them to earn that amount. Our authority is limited to inquire into the reasonableness of a particular rate or rates and establishing that rate or practice which is found lawful in place of the one condemned as unlawful."

After further explanation of the point, the opinion says (p. 248):

"When, as here, there is involved the propriety of advances which affect the entire rate fabric within this territory, embracing one-half the tonnage and one-half the freight revenues of this whole country, and when that advance is justified mainly upon the ground, not of commercial conditions, but by lack of adequate revenue upon the present rate basis, this commission must determine the fundamental question.

"It might not follow, even though we were of the opinion that these carriers were entitled to additional revenue, that they ought to obtain it from an advance of these particular rates. We might be of the opinion that only a portion of these advances should have been made or that other articles altogether should have been selected. It might be true that even though there were no need of additional revenue some or all of these rates could be properly advanced, but as this case is presented and as preliminary to the consideration of these further questions we must dispose of the basic question: Are these defendants justified at this time in demanding additional revenues from the public for the services which they are rendering?"

The commission, after thus stating the general question involved, reviews the whole history of railway construction, capitalization, and financing. It dwells upon the fact that neither the property account kept by the railroad companies nor the capitalization is at all reliable in determining the value of the property upon which a return is to be allowed. It points out the great difference in the dividend-paying capacity of the 35 systems which comprise substantially the railroads operating in the territory under consideration. For instance, it suggests that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western had a corporate income for the year 1910 amounting to 49.77 per cent upon its outstanding capital stock, having grown to that figure from 16.63 per cent in 1901; also, that the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. not only paid a dividend of 18 per cent upon its stock in 1910, but added $5,000,000 to its surplus.

These observations brought it to a consideration of this question: Should the condition of the very strong or the very weak railroads be taken as the basis for the ascertainment of an adequate revenue? It reached the conclusion in accordance with the holding in the Spokane case (15 I. C. C. Rep., 376) and the Kindel case (15 I. C. C. Rep., 555) that a medium course should be pursued. It therefore segregated three systems, viz, the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, and the Baltimore & Ohio, remarking (p. 274):

"We do not mean that other lines should not be considered, but that these systems may be taken as typical. Under rates reasonable for these three systems there may be lines whose earnings will be extravagant, but this is their good fortune. There may be lines which can not make sufficient earnings, but this is their misfortune. We ought not to impose upon this territory for the purpose of allowing these defendants additional revenues higher rates than are adequate to these three systems considered as a whole."

The Baltimore & Ohio was first examined. Its property investment account in 1909 was $406,000,000, its capitalization in 1910 $565,000,000. From the earnings of 1910, and after an allowance for an increase of wages, which was imminent, it was found that it could pay cost of operation and maintenance, taxes, interest upon all its bonds, dividends upon its preferred stock, a dividend of 6 per cent upon the common stock, and carry to surplus $2,776,000. This, in view of the fact that it was perfectly well known that the capitalization vastly exceeded the investment, was thought to be quite sufficient. The commission then turned to the Pennsylvania system, which is all interwoven owning and holding companies. It is composed of about an hundred railroads. It is generally supposed that this is the one system decently capitalized, and it is unquestionably true that in recent years its stock has been issued for full consideration. But in the combination there was as much water in the stock as can be found in any capitalization. The report of the system is a complicated one, and I will not enter it. It is sufficient to say that its dividends have always been good, the market value of its stock high, and that a very large part of its extensions and betterments for the last 30 years have been paid for out of earnings. The commission had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that no increase in rates was necessary in order to enable it to adequately reward its owners. The same conclusion was reached with respect to the New York Central. And the commission held unhesitatingly that the railway companies had not sustained the burden of proof which the law imposes upon them—that is to say, had not shown that the proposed increased rates were just and reasonable—and it therefore denied the increases.

The principles of law announced in this decision are: First, that when a group of railroads, acting evidently in concert, propose general increases in rates it is lawful to inquire whether the aggregate earnings are adequate to yield a fair return upon the value of the property rendering the service; second, that in making the inquiry types may be selected as fairly representative of the entire group; third, that if it were found that the earnings, so considered, are not adequate it would still be necessary for additional proof showing that the increased rates are just and reasonable.

The conclusion of the decision is that the earnings of this group of roads, to and including 1910, were adequate. It became unnecessary, therefore, to enter the further inquiry. The standing of the securities in the stock markets of the country at any given time was expressly repudiated as an element for consideration in determining the reasonableness of the proposed rates.

Passing on to the Western case, decided at the same time, it will be sufficient to say that it covered proposed increases upon some 200 commodities and involved more than 200 railroads operating in the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Montana. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Lane, and, together with the opinion of Mr. Prouty in the Eastern case, constitutes the most luminous and instructive exposition of the law of rate fixing, the mutual rights of common carriers and the public, which can be found in the literature of this or any other country. Not only so, but they furnish the most reliable and satisfactory information respecting the history and operation of the railroads within my knowledge.

I can not reproduce Mr. Lane's unanswerable argument, but if anyone desires to know how far Mr. Daniels has departed from both the law and the morals of the subject, he ought to read with care the brilliant and uncontrovertible reasoning of Commissioner Lane. Adopting the principle of the Eastern case, he also selected types for the western group, namely, the Chicago & North Western; the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific; and the Chicago & Alton. He found that the earnings were adequate, and I only wish that I dared to consume the time to pass through his analysis of the property investment accounts and the capitalization of these companies. The opinion is especially important in that, for the first time, the claim made by the railroads that the betterments and extensions made from surplus earnings are to be considered as though made from independent capital is squarely met and emphatically overthrown. For the first time, also, the alleged increase in the value of the rights of way is dealt with courageously; and for the first time the relation of rates to great and expensive terminals which do not add to the economy or volume of business is given serious consideration.

The cry that became the watchword in 1913, "We need the money," was heard in this proceeding, and Commissioner Lane's response is a classic. The principles laid down are exactly the same as those announced in the Eastern case, and the ruling is identical.

Remember that these two cases adjudicated the situation up to the year 1911. In 1913 the Five Per Cent case (31 I. C. C. R., 351) was brought forward. It involved the same railroads, the same territory that were considered in the Eastern case, which I have examined at length, and covered many additional rates. The initial question was the same, namely, "Do the present rates of transportation yield to common carriers by railroad operating in official classification territory adequate revenue?" (p. 355).

The only evidence additional to that produced in 1910 consisted of the reports and accounts of the railroads for the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and to July 1, 1914. The comparisons shown in the tables, which are made a part of the opinion, are mainly based upon the property investment accounts, simply because there was no other showing with regard to the value of the railway properties. It had been declared over and over again by the commission that these accounts as kept by the railway companies were exceedingly unreliable, and it is, I think, recognized that with respect to most railroads the account far exceeds the value of the property.

Just as an illustration it may be interesting to note that the valuation division appointed by the Interstate Commerce Commission has completed its work with respect to four small railway systems, and I am able to compare the result of the work with the property investment accounts and capitalization of each of these roads.

First, the Kansas City Southern Railway Co.:
Its capitalization is	$99,052,000
Its property investment account is	47,278,760
Its cost of reproduction, less depreciation, including value of land, is	25,257,880
The Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Co.:
Its capitalization is	$54,561,000
Its property investment account is, including nearly $3,000,000 expended by receivers	53,326,000
Its cost of reproduction, less depreciation, including the value of land	21,700,223

The New Orleans, Texas & Mexico Railroad Co.:
Capitalization	$40,936,000
Property investment account	32,174,000
Cost of reproduction, less depreciation, including the value of land	7,714,000
The Texas Midland Railroad Co.:
Capitalization	$2,112,000
Property investment account	3,474,000
Cost of reproduction, less depreciation, and including value of land	2,763,000

It needs but a moment's consideration of these figures to demonstrate that whatever may be the value of railroad properties, their property investment accounts are greatly in excess of their true value, unless an extravagant allowance is made for the increasing value of the rights of way.

I have always believed that under the amendment of 1910 it was incumbent upon a railway company desiring to increase its rates, the increases having been suspended, to prove by some kind of competent evidence the value of its property. None of the railway companies concerned in the 1910 proceeding attempted to make any proof of this character. The commission, for want of anything better, really accepted for the time being the property investment accounts. It must be obvious, however, that in so doing it should not have required a high ratio of net operating income in order to reach the conclusion that the returns were adequate. The whole case was really judged by the table found on page 367, the last column of which gives the ratio of net operating income to property investment account. The table covers the entire period from 1899 to 1914. I do not concede the correctness of the plan through which the averages were ascertained; but, adopting it for the moment, it will be seen that the percentage of return for 1911 was 5.23 per cent, for 1912, 5.19 per cent, and for 1913, 5.36 per cent. These are the three years which had intervened since the former decision, and there is no such inadequacy in these returns as to warrant a reversal of the former opinion. The average ratio of the years 1908, 1909, and 1910 was 5.69 per cent; the average of the three following years was 5.26 per cent, the difference being only forty-three one-hundredths of 1 per cent.

I mention these facts not for the purpose of criticizing the final conclusion of the commission, but to show the exceedingly slight basis for it. With many of the roads, and this is markedly true of the larger systems, the ratio of net corporate income to the capitalization, excessive as that may be, is large enough to satisfy the demands of the most exacting. But I do not intend to complicate this argument by extensive tabulation. I must, however, call attention to this fact: That when it is remembered that nearly two-thirds of the capital of all the railroads is represented in bonds which bear less than 4½ per cent interest, a ratio of 3.36 per cent (that of 1913) upon the whole capital means more than 7 per cent upon the stock capital. I am therefore compelled to believe that if the finding in the 1910 case, to the effect that the revenues were adequate, is sound, the finding in the 1913 case, that they were not adequate, is unsound. This phase of the matter, however, is not so important to the entire consideration, and I mention it only to show the gradual yielding of the commission to the tremendous pressure brought to bear upon it. Notwithstanding the finding that the net operating income of these roads was insufficient in the broad sense, it was declared (p. 404):

"We find that the financial condition of the trunk line carriers does not warrant a general increase of freight rates, and shall also show that the needs of the New England lines are being cared for locally. The carriers failed to prove either that the existing rates in trunk line or New England territories are too low or that the increased rates proposed for those territories would be just and reasonable rates. Nor have they proved that the existing interterritorial rates in official classification territory are too low or that the proposed increases in those rates would be just and reasonable. The carriers will be required, therefore, to cancel all the tariffs in which these rates are proposed."

It will be recalled that the commission found that sufficient evidence had been offered that certain rates in Central Freight Association territory should be increased; not, however, as the result of the investigation as to adequacy of revenues. I have always regretted the inconsistency between the finding in the 1910 case and the finding in the 1913 case. But the matter was plainly within the jurisdiction of the commission, and I have never criticized its judgment in this regard. I have never criticized it, because the five members of the commission who joined in the latter decision proceeded according to law, and whether they were mistaken in their conclusion or not they respected the authority under which they acted. Mr. Daniels, however, dissented, and the reasons for his dissent furnish one of my objections to his confirmation. He reverses all previous decisions of the commission when he says (p. 435):

"The testimony offered by the carriers deals mainly with insufficiency of return. Such testimony is germane and proper. Evidence establishing general inadequacy of return impeaches the general reasonableness of rates which result in such inadequate return. It is not conclusive evidence that rates are unduly low, but it creates a reasonable presumption to that effect, and it suffices to meet the burden of proof cast by the law upon the carriers which propose rate advances."

This, in my judgment, was a fundamental error, but it was only an error. It was not usurpation. I will not attempt to point out what I regard as the fallacies of his averages or the mistakes in his statistical conclusions, for they shrink into insignificance in the light of his startling views as to the tests in rate making. I quote again (p. 453):

"Expected earnings constitute in the last analysis the bid which the carriers must make for new capital for needed improvements, extensions, new rolling stock, and similar purposes. It is not necessary to say that on such a showing the investing public will hardly be eager to intrust its funds to transportation enterprises. Where well-secured, long-time bonds bearing 4½ per cent interest command little over par only on the prospect of a much higher rate of return, it is clear that the carriers must make a better showing of net revenue before they can as a whole enlist large additional supplies of capital."

The meaning of this, as I gather it, is that no matter how exaggerated the basis of value may be, the rates must be such as will keep the stocks of railway corporations favorites in the market; that is to say, the people must pay for all the financial mistakes, crimes, and mismanagement of a half century of conscienceless promotion.

I can not bring myself to believe that one who looks at the railway problem from any such standpoint should be intrusted with the authority conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

If this were all that Mr. Daniels has said, it might not be enough to warrant the rejection of his nomination; but, unfortunately, this is not all.

A supplemental hearing of the case was ordered, and it was again submitted October 30, 1914, and the decision upon the rehearing was rendered December 16, 1914. The opinion is "By the commission." I do not know who wrote it, but inasmuch as it carries into effect the views which Mr. Daniels expressed in his dissent, I assume that it is his production, directly or indirectly. The order for the further hearing contains this provision (32 I. C. C. Rep., 326):

"Said hearing to be limited to presentation of facts disclosed and occurrences originating subsequently to the date upon which the records previously made in these cases were closed."

The "facts disclosed and occurrences originating" subsequent to the former decision are, first, the reports of the railway companies from the 1st of June, 1914, to the 1st of October, 1914.

As to these facts, all that need be said is that 1914 was a bad year for all kinds of business, and was recognized by everybody as abnormal.

Second, the war in Europe, with the probability that railroad securities held abroad would be dumped upon the American markets, and that this would force down the price of such securities and result in a disturbance to insurance, banking, and industrial enterprises. Ridding the opinion of all its pretense, it is perfectly obvious that the thing really considered on the rehearing as sufficient to reverse the former order was the effect which an increase of rates would have upon the general business of the country. I quote (pp. 329–330):

"The war in Europe will doubtless create an unusual demand upon the world's loan fund of free capital, and may be expected to check the flow of foreign investment funds to American railroads. It appears that our railroads represent the bulk of European investment in this country. The rate of interest—the hire of capital—has risen during the last decade and may rise still further. It is computed that in the years 1915, 1916, and 1917 the carriers in official classification territory must arrange for the payment or refunding of securities aggregating over $500,000,000. True, the representations of the carriers in the 1910 cases, that without the increases then sought their credit must totally vanish, proved strangely at variance with their subsequent experience in the borrowing of many hundreds of millions. But we do not doubt that the financial problems of the carriers have been made much more acute by reason of the war, and if we are to set rates that will afford reasonable remuneration to these carriers, we must give consideration to the increased hire of capital as well as to other increased costs. * * * While we differ as to the relative importance to be attached to the various considerations presented, we agree in the conclusion that, by virtue of the conditions obtaining at present, it is necessary that the carriers' revenues be supplemented by increases throughout official classification territory. Whatever the consequences of the war may prove to be, we must recognize the fact that it exists, the fact that it is a calamity without precedent, and the fact that by it the commerce of the world has been disarranged and thrown into confusion. The means of transportation are fundamental and indispensable agencies in our industrial life and for the common weal should be kept abreast of public requirements."

Thereupon, the original decision was reversed, and the increases, with some exceptions, were allowed. When the volume and profits of the railway business for the two years which immediately followed this decision are considered, it makes one shudder to reflect upon the frailties of government. The point is, however, that the decision upon rehearing, made by five members of the commission, is an arbitrary, unauthorized act of power. It is a clear usurpation. It, and another decision which shortly followed, have imposed upon the people of this country during the last two years an unjust burden of anywhere from fifty to a hundred and fifty millions of dollars; and the injustice will repeat itself every year until a remedy is applied. Two members of the commission, Mr. Harlan and Mr. Clements, dissented. Commissioner Clements said (p. 337):

"In my view the foregoing report and decision constitute a new and radical departure and a most serious and portentious step, in that by this step the commission is shown to deem itself justified in sanctioning these increased rates in the latter territory upon consideration of general financial and operating results, without resorting to other ordinary tests or factors heretofore deemed pertinent and necessary to the determination of the reasonableness of rates. I am not aware of any prior case in which this commission or any court has held that the need by a carrier of money was of itself proof of the reasonableness of a specific rate or body of rates increased to meet such need."

Again (p. 337):

"If the basis of the conclusions of the majority of the commission sanctioning these rates in trunk-line territory is sound, and points to the rule of action for the future, the burden placed by the law upon the carriers to justify increases in rates is, indeed, made light and easy to carry, especially when by concerted action a group of carriers, some strong and some weak, simultaneously propose to increase the great body of their rates."

And again (p. 338):

"If the legislative authority of the commission is as broad and unrestricted as this, then I must confess that I have gravely misunderstood the limitations upon our statutory authority as well as the constitutional power of Congress to delegate its legislative power."

Again (p. 340):

"If, now, to strengthen and maintain the credit of the carriers, regardless of the causes of its exhaustion or impairment, and without the application of the usual tests of reasonableness, these increases are jutified, then it seems to me that we are only at the beginning of what I fear will be a train of demoralizing results, disappointing and embarrassing to all concerned. It is by no means certain that it would not, in the long run, be cheaper to the public to guarantee the bonds of the weak roads unable to meet their obligations, rather than to try to take care of them by increased rates, which inure to the strong roads as well as the weak."

I now raise the curtain on the last act of this five-year tragedy. It is the opinion and ruling of the commission in the Western Rate Advance case. (35 I. C. C. R., 497.) It involved the proposed increase upon about 200 commodities in a territory which is substantially, but not accurately, described as lying between Chicago on the east and a line running north and south through the United States through Denver.

There are a great many railroads operating in this region, but, as everybody knows, a very large part of the business is done by comparatively few systems, the names of which are familiar to every Senator.

The opinion was delivered "by the commission." I do not know who prepared it, but it reflects in part the views which Mr. Daniels expressed in his dissent in the Eastern case of 1913, views which are really the logical sequence of the doctrines held by the utilities commissioners of New Jersey. The opinion disturbs me because it goes much beyond the safe limits of sound regulation, as I shall presently point out. Mr. Daniels not only concurred in the increases allowed in the opinion, but he dissented because greater increases were not permitted.

Here, again, the principal inquiry related to the sufficiency of the aggregate net operating income to meet the needs of all these railroads, and again we have presented a bewildering, intangible series of tables with their erroneous and misleading statements. It is to be said, however, that the case did not call for the extraordinary and unlawful assumption of jurisdiction disclosed in the rehearing of the Eastern case, and my chief criticism of the decision is that after discrediting the property investment accounts and the outstanding capitalization of the railways by pointed references to their known unreliability, the commission finally accepted these values in part at least.

There are some things about the case which stand out with especial prominence, and I venture to mention two or three of them.

First. It is made quite clear that, in the judgment of the commission, rates for transportation must constantly increase as the country develops, as population and traffic become more dense, and as the volume of commerce expands. This is a shock to a good many of us who had been hoping that the general rules of industry would prevail in this field and that rates for transportation could be gradually reduced.

Second. The opinion seems to proceed upon the hypothesis that competent management, honest administration, favorable location, and considering a railroad as a means of carriage instead of an opportunity on the stock exchange, are no longer factors in the great problem of regulation. Or, if factors at all, they have become negligible in the present civilization. This also is a severe blow to those of us who have held firmly to the now obsolete principle that the rewards of life should go to those who deserve them.

Third. For the first time it was suggested that if intrastate rates, and apparently whether fixed by the States or the railroads themselves, are higher than interstate rates this may be accepted as proof that the interstate rates are too low. This is so involved a proposition that I can not ask Senators to take my word for it, and I quote a single sentence from page 589:

"For these reasons we believe that the level of State and interstate rates, which has been so forcefully pressed upon our attention in this case, becomes a material factor in judging of the propriety of the proposed increase of rates."

As authority for such a position there is cited the somewhat famous Shreveport case. (23 I. C. C. R., 32.) I venture to say that the Shreveport opinion, instead of sustaining this new idea, is diametrically opposed to it.

Fourth. There is another thought in the opinion which I have not been able to fully comprehend. Speaking of the comparison between intrastate and interstate rates, it is said (p. 589):

"What this just proportion of the transportation burden should be is a matter which may not be disposed of on the record in this proceeding, but it has been brought to our attention, and can not be ignored in a proceeding involving the propriety of increased interstate rates. 'Propriety' is a broader and more inclusive term than 'reasonableness.'"

If this is to be understood as establishing the rule that rates are to be approved or disapproved according to their "propriety" instead of their "reasonableness," we have indeed lost all the landmarks of the law.

It would be impossible for me upon this occasion to comment upon all the tables and authorities which enter into the opinion; much less can I examine all the statistics with which it overflows; but there is one table so far removed from the mysteries so attractive to experts that I must be permitted to mention it. It is one of the things in the opinion that can be understood by the common mind. It is found on page 559. It gives the dividends actually paid on the common stock of 14 of the railway systems concerned in the investigation; also the percentage on the common stock carried to surplus for sinking funds, additions to property, and the like, the average of both items during a period of 20 years, and the sum of both items for the year 1914.

The average dividend paid on the common stock of the Great Northern—

	Per cent.
For 10 years (1890–1899) was	4.60
For the years 1905–1914	7.00
The dividend paid for 1914 was	7.00
The average surplus for 10 years, 1890–1899	4.825
And for 1905–1914	2.694
For the year 1914	1.80
The average net income for surplus on both, 1890–1899, was	9.425
For 1905–1914	9.694
For the year 1914	8.80

The figures for the Northern Pacific, arranged in the same way, are: 0.20, 7.00, 7.00, 0.839, 3.170, 1.02, 0.639, 10.170, and 8.02 per cent.

The Chicago & North Western are: 5.40, 7.00, 7.00, 3.451, 4.718, 1.06, 8.851, 11.718, and 8.06 per cent.

The figures for the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul are: 2.85, 6.50, 5.00, 2.708, 3.243, 1.31, 5.558, and 6.31 per cent.

If you will allow these facts to sink into your minds you will conclude, I am sure, that the Great Northern; Northern Pacific; Chicago & Northwestern; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy; Union Pacific; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe; and Southern Pacific have been munificently rewarded, for do not forget that these dividends and percentages of surplus are upon the par of the capital stock. You will easily recall why it is that the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific does not made an equally good showing. Its startling record in the issuance and manipulation of capitalization is too well known to need any explanation. You know also what territory is covered by these great systems, and you have a general idea of the volume of business which they do as compared with the five other roads. The Missouri Pacific, incompetently managed and indecently exploited; the St. Louis & San Francisco, the victim of pirates; the Missouri, Kansas & Texas, which suffers every misfortune which can fall upon a railway property; and the Texas Pacific, have not prospered, it is true; but to me the wrong of fastening upon the people who are served by 10 amply rewarded railroads the burden of higher rates in order to alleviate the disasters of these 4 unfortunates is unspeakable. It would be manifestly better and fairer if we were to appropriate from the National Treasury the sums required to pay a return upon the actual value of these cripples in the army of transportation.

Objectionable as the decision is in some of its phases and expressions, Mr. Daniels again led the way toward larger revenues by filing a dissenting opinion. He succeeded in making his dissenting opinion in the Eastern case the judgment of the commission after the lapse of a little time, and my fear is that he will ultimately induce the commission to follow him in the western territory.

I quote from the opening paragraph of the dissent (p. 654):

"In the essential outcome of the majority's report I am unable to concur, believing that on the record the carriers have in general sustained the burden of proof cast upon them by the statute and are of right entitled to increases in rates productive of revenue far in excess of what they are accorded by this decision. The reasons for my concurrence or nonconcurrence in particular findings will be stated later in some detail, but my inability to acquiesce in the general tenor of the report is due to a fundamental divergence from the views of the majority, as I understand them, with reference to certain important considerations which should control in the determination of a case of this character."

I will not review his long analysis of the evidence, but I hope that Senators will examine the entire opinion. Whatever else may be said of Mr. Daniels, he can not be accused of inconsistency, and he carries into this so-called dissenting opinion the extreme views with respect to railway revenues which I have heretofore attempted to point out.

I have said enough to reveal the general situation and the part which Mr. Daniels has played in creating it. Some ignorant or malicious persons will insist that I have a desire to refuse to the railway corporations adequate revenues. It is not so. I believe I am willing to come up to the standard of every fair-minded man who has ever explored the subject. I insist, however, that the present revenues meet these standards, and that they will, if honestly administered, provide a basis for the remuneration of all the property now rendering a public service, and for all additional capital that may be required for extensions and improvements. I refuse to be misled by false alarms or to be deceived by skillfully devised reports, tables, and ratios.

I feel the deepest interest in maintaining the Interstate Commerce Commission high in the confidence of the country. My view of the work of Mr. Daniels in public office has convinced me, and I think it ought to convince everybody, that his retention upon the commission will impair the standing of the tribunal, and that his firmly fixed convictions upon the subject of regulation will ultimately destroy our system of regulation and control.

There are a great many important and honorable offices in the United States which he could fill, I have no doubt, with distinction for himself and with much advantage to the people, and if he were nominated for one of these I would gladly vote for his confirmation; but he has disqualified himself for the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with the full consciousness of the seriousness of the question before me I shall vote against confirmation.

WINTHROP M. DANIELS.

MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES ON JANUARY 9, 1917, IN SUPPORT OF THE CONFIRMATION OF THE NOMINATION OF WINTHROP MORE DANIELS TO BE A MEMBER OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION BY HON. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM NEVADA.

The opposition to the confirmation of Mr. Daniels as Interstate Commerce Commissioner is based upon two distinct grounds: (1) The principles enunciated by him as a member of the New Jersey Public Utility Commission in the Paterson-Passaic Gas case, and the danger of applying these principles to the Federal valuation of railroads; and (2) upon Mr. Daniels's deliverances and influence as Interstate Commerce Commissioner in the Five Per Cent case of 1914 and the Western Rate Advance case of 1915. Mr. Daniels became a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission in April, 1914.

THE PATERSON-PASSAIC GAS CASE.

This was an investigation by the Public Utility Commission of New Jersey, upon its own motion, into the reasonableness and justice of rates charged for gas by the Public Service Gas Co.

The territory covered included the cities of Paterson and Passaic, N. J., and 13 adjacent municipalities, mostly suburban.

THE DECISION ORDERED A REDUCTION IN RATES TO THE CONSUMER.

Before discussing the principles upon which the valuation for rate making purposes in this case was made by the New Jersey commission, we direct attention first of all to the fact that the outcome of the case was a reduction in the price of gas to the consumers.

The rate charged by the company had been $1.10 per thousand cubic feet, with a discount of 10 cents for prompt payment. This was reduced by order of the New Jersey commission to a rate per thousand cubic feet of 90 cents flat. The reduction thus required by order in the Paterson-Passaic district was extended, as the New Jersey commission had recommended, to five other large districts served by the Public Gas Co. The resultant annual reduction of charges to consumers of gas in the entire State of New Jersey amounted to over $1,000,000 a year.

THE DECISION FIXED A VALUATION WHICH IN AMOUNT WAS ABOUT ONE-HALF OF THE FACE VALUE OF THE SECURITIES.

Again, before entering upon an analysis of the valuation principles upon which the New Jersey commission proceeded, attention should be directed to the fact that while the outstanding obligations of the gas company in this district were $9,100,000, par value, consisting of $5,000,000 stock and $4,100,000 bonds, the base, or valuation, on which the New Jersey commission permitted the company to earn was fixed at $4,750,000, or about one-half of the par value of the securities outstanding.

Whatever of error may be alleged to inhere in the principles followed by the New Jersey commission in this case their application resulted in a reduction in rates to consumers, and in exempting the community from any pretense which the Public Service Gas Co. could thereafter urge that it was entitled to earn on the face value of its securities.

It may be said by way of anticipation that the effects characterized as "more than disastrous" if the principles applied in this gas case were applied to railroads signally failed to materialize in the particular case in question. The prediction that if these principles of valuation of the New Jersey commission were applied to railroads their valuation "would exceed the existing capitalization by more than $600,000,000" was not only not realized in the Paterson-Passaic Gas case, but instead practically one-half of the face value of the securities was by inference pronounced invalid as evidencing any claim for earnings that could be made by the company upon the consumers of gas.

For fear of misapprehension, it should be repeated and reemphasized that the basis on which the company was pronounced entitled to a fair return from rates was fixed wholly without reference to the company's securities and at a figure but slightly in excess of the company's bonds outstanding, or, to be exact, in excess of the par value of the bonds by an amount equal to exactly 13 per cent of the face value of the stock.

The securities outstanding of the Public Service Gas Co. in the Paterson-Passaic district amounted to $9,100,000, composed of $5,000,000 stock and $4,100,000 bonds. Instead of setting a return upon the par value of the securities the New Jersey commission fixed a return based on the value of the property and the business attached of approximately 50 per cent of that sum, to wit, $4,750,000. The basis upon which the 8 per cent return was allowed has been misapprehended. The contention is in the following words:

"What does this 8 per cent per annum upon the value as found by the commissioners mean? It sufficiently appears from the decision that one-half or more of the capitalization of this value was represented by bonds bearing interest at the rate of not more than 5 per cent per annum. If I assume that the other half was represented by general stock, the result is a yearly dividend of 11 per cent, or a dividend of 9 per cent, with 2 per cent for surplus."

This misapprehension seems to be founded on the erroneous assumption that the New Jersey commission allowed 8 per cent on the face value of the securities. The 8 per cent return was allowed, not upon the value of the securities, but upon about half of that amount, represented by the valuation of $4,750,000, found by the New Jersey commission to be the value of the property and the business attached. Eight per cent upon this valuation amounts to $380,000. If out of this sum 5 per cent were paid on the bonds, the bondholders would receive $205,000. The permitted total earnings of $380,000 less $205,000 (or 5 per cent on the bonds) would leave $175,000 to pay dividends on $5,000,000 of stock. This would be exactly 3½ per cent, instead of 11 per cent, as erroneously estimated under the misapprehension referred to.

VALUATION PRINCIPLES INVOLVED IN THE GAS CASE.

There are two principles followed by the New Jersey Public Utility Commission in the Paterson-Passaic Gas case which are alluded to as erroneous. These are, first, making an allowance for what are termed "overhead charges," the allowance being added to the estimated value or cost of the physical structures to obtain the aggregate valuation of the tangible property. The second principle alleged to be erroneous is the allowance which the New Jersey Public Utility Commission made for "going concern value" or "going value," or what might be appropriately termed the business or patronage acquired by the company, and which is ordinarily quite distinct from the tangible property owned by a gas company.

It is contended that these are the two essential principles of valuation which are erroneous.

These two matters will be treated in their order.

THE PROPRIETY OF AN ALLOWANCE FOR OVERHEAD CHARGES.

In order to understand the items that are in whole or in part generally included under the head of "Overhead charges," the following list, taken from Whitten, Valuation of Public Service Corporations (p. 210, sec. 240), is cited as illustrative. The items covered in overhead charges embrace—

1. Engineering and superintendence.
2. Contingencies.
3. Contractor's profit.
4. Interest during construction.
5. Legal and general expense, company organization, taxes, and insurance.
6. Promotion.

It should be clearly understood that the allowance for these charges is made to obtain the value of physical structures. They are not to be confused with allowances for intangible values of any kind. Perhaps the simplest illustration of overhead charges arises in connection with the building of a dwelling house. A complete inventory and valuation of material in place, such as walls, timbers, roof, etc., inevitably falls short of the cost of such a building. There are, in addition, the architect's bill, insurance during the building process, interest foregone on such sums as are held in readiness for serial payments to contractors, contingencies, etc. To obtain the entire cost of the structure these costs must be added to the cost of actual material in place.

In making valuations of the plant of public-service corporations similar allowances are regularly made to obtain a complete valuation of the physical property. These allowances are now being regularly allowed by the valuation bureau of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the approval of the advisory board of that bureau, and not by the requirement or instruction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

These allowances are regularly made by practically all competent and intelligent engineers. They have received court approval, and particularly in the following cases: Des Moines (Iowa) Water Rate case of 1910, where Judge McPherson granted an injunction based upon the master's findings involving two estimates of the property, in one of which the allowance for the overhead charges was 16 per cent and in the other 28.5 per cent. (Authority, Des Moines Water Co. v. City of Des Moines, No. 2468, in equity, United States Circuit Court, Southern District of Iowa; also summarized on pp. 221–222 of Whitten on Valuation.)

Other instances of allowances for "overhead" are the following:

In the appraisal of the Chicago city railways in 1906, which was used as the basis of the franchise settlement ordinances, February 11, 1907, where the allowance for the total of overhead charges was fixed at 17.21 per cent of the value of structures. (Authority, Whitten, Valuation, 213–215.)

In the Cleveland street railway appraisal of 1909 Judge Robert W. Taylor, acting as arbiter, allowed, in addition to the total inventory value, a percentage of 10 per cent to cover overhead charges. (Authority, Whitten, Valuation, p. 219.)

In the Minnesota State railroad appraisal of 1908 the total overhead charges allowed were 17.7 per cent. (Authority, Whitten, Valuation, p. 228.)

In the Oklahoma Telephone Rate case the State supreme court approved an allowance for overhead charges covering engineering and supervision of 10 per cent. (Authority, 118 Pac., 354.)

In the Wisconsin State railroad appraisal of 1903 total overhead charges were allowed of 13.2 per cent. (Authority, Whitten, Valuation, p. 237.)

In valuation made by the Wisconsin Railroad Commission for water, gas, and electric-light plants the general rule has been to allow 12 per cent for overhead expenses. (Authority, 5 Wis. R. R. Comm. Repts., 113, decided Mar. 28, 1910; 8 Wis. R. R. Comm. Repts., 138–157, Nov. 17, 1911.)

In practically all cases public-service commissions, courts, and intelligent and fair-minded engineers have made an allowance for overhead expenses in addition to the value of physical structures. It is therefore submitted that it is erroneous to hold that such an allowance in addition to the inventory of physical structures is a "fatal departure from sound principles."

The allowance of 17.6 per cent for overhead charges by the New Jersey commission is thus unfavorably characterized:

"This was said and the thing was done, notwithstanding the fact that not a word of testimony had been introduced showing that the company had ever made any such expenditures, or that any such capital remained idle during any such period.

"This was said and the thing was done, notwithstanding the perfectly obvious truth that the company, or its predecessors, had been making and selling gas for many years, had been charging exorbitant prices for it, and that whatever expenditures had been made or whatever idle capital to be rewarded the earnings of the company had been ample to cover and had covered all such items."

The statement cited above seems to disclose a misapprehension of the situation. There had been made by the New Jersey commission a complete inventory and appraisal of the physical property, gas houses, holders, mains, etc. Some of these had been constructed many years ago, and there were no complete accounts, and in many cases no books of account at all, of the various concerns that had been merged and consolidated, both legally and physically, into the existing plant of the Public Service Gas Co. It was self-evident that overhead expenses had been incurred when these properties were constructed. In default of actual record of costs a number of competent and expert engineers were called to testify as to the per cent allowance appropriate for overhead charges. On consideration of their testimony the estimate of 17.6 per cent of the value of the existing structures was found by the New Jersey commission as the fair allowance for these costs, and that amount was added to the structural value to obtain the aggregate physical valuation. It should be added that this allowance for overhead charges was practically not seriously contested when an appeal was taken from the order of the New Jersey commission to the courts.

It is therefore submitted with confidence that the allowance for "overhead charges" which Senator CUMMINS contends was erroneously made by the New Jersey commission has in its support not only its prima facie reasonableness and propriety, but also the practically universal approval of engineers, public-service commissions, and courts.

THE ALLOWANCE FOR "GOING VALUE" OR "GOING CONCERN VALUE."

It is contended that the action of the New Jersey commission in making an allowance for "going value" or "going concern value," approximately 30 per cent of the cost of the physical structures, and of adding this allowance to the cost of the physical structures to obtain a base upon which to predicate reasonable earnings from rates charged consumers was and is erroneous.

"Going value" or "going concern value" in the case of a gas company is best described as the value of the business attached, as distinguished from the physical property of the gas company. There is apparently no denial of the fact that a gas plant with consumers connected to the mains is worth more as a revenue producer and a public-service agency than the same plant without the consumers attached. If consumers, when gas mains are first extended to their neighborhood, always promptly and generally had their dwellings piped for gas, had gas cooking and heating appliances introduced into their homes and shops, and voluntarily and at their own expense connected with the street mains, this item of "going concern" in the case of a gas company might possibly be disregarded.

But the testimony in this Paterson-Passaic case showed convincingly that custom or patronage are not and were not thus promptly and without expense acquired by the gas company or the constituent companies which had been merged therein. The securing of business by a gas company involved and involves free installations, free exhibitions, the solicitation of patronage, and various other items of expense for which, as Senator CUMMINS apparently admits, the company is entitled to reimbursement. He apparently contends that these items should normally be paid out of current revenue. It should, however, be observed that at the very time these expenses are incurred the current revenue is presumably less ample than it will thereafter become when the additional patronage and consumption has been secured. Moreover, these expenses are incurred once for all like capital expenses generally, and are not regularly recurrent like coal or labor bills. It has therefore in notable instances been determined, where a public appraisal or valuation has been made, to capitalize the cost of acquiring patronage or custom and to allow for these costs separate and apart from the physical plant under the head of "going value."

This fact of the separate cost of building up the business as distinct from the cost of building the physical structures was treated by the Wisconsin Railroad Commission in a case decided August 3, 1909 (Hill v. Antigo Water Co., 3 Wis. R. R. Com. Rpts., 623). That commission says (at p. 706):

"But new plants are seldom paying at the start. Several years are usually required before they obtain a sufficient amount of business or earnings to cover operating expenses, including depreciation and a reasonable rate of interest upon the investment. The amount by which the earnings fail to meet these requirements may thus be regarded as deficits from the operation. These deficits constitute the cost of building up the business of the plant. They are as much a part of the cost of building up the business as loss of interest during the construction of the plant is a part of the cost of its construction. They are taken into account by those who enter upon such undertakings, and if they can not be recovered in some way the plant fails by that much to yield reasonable returns upon the amount that has been expended upon it and its business. Such deficits may be covered either by being regarded as a part of the investment and included in the capital upon which interest is allowed, or they may be carried until they can be written off when the earnings have so grown as to leave a surplus above a reasonable return on the investment that is large enough to permit it. When capitalized they become a permanent charge on the consumers. * * * Whether they should go into the capital account, or whether they should be written off, as indicated, are questions that largely depend on the circumstances in each particular case."

Another Wisconsin case in which clear recognition is made of "going value" is Payne et al. v. Wisconsin, August 3, 1909. In the report of that case (vol. 4, Wis. R. R. Com. Rpts., p. 61) it is said:

"* * * If property is devoted to the public use, and reasonable care has been exercised in all the phases of its management, but the owners have not received a fair return during the earlier years of the operation of the plant in which the property is used for the convenience of the public, the deficit thus incurred must be made up out of later earnings, in so far as this is commercially possible and expedient. In other words, every effort honestly put forth, every dollar properly expended, and every obligation legitimately incurred in the establishment of an efficient public-utility business must be taken into consideration in the making of rates for such business. Collectively the elements just referred to may be designated by the term going value, and in this sense there can be no question regarding the propriety and justice of admitting going value as a consideration in the determination of rates. Whether this going value should be made a part of the permanent capitalization of the plant, or provided for by means of a sinking or other fund, is a matter to be decided on the facts in each particular case."

Apart from the decisions of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission, valuations for rate making, including a separate appraisal for going value over and above the value of the physical structures, have received the approval of courts in the following instances: The Des Moines Water case, No. 2468 in equity, Circuit Court of the United States, Southern District of Iowa, Central Division, September 16, 1910; the Pioneer Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Westenhaver, by the Supreme Court of Oklahoma (118 Pac., 354), decided January 10, 1911; the Urbana, Ohio, Water Rate case; C. H. Venner Co. v. Urbana Waterworks (174 Fed., 348), decided November 6, 1909.

THE INCLUSION OF GOING VALUE IN THIS CASE APPROVED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW JERSEY AND THE COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS OF NEW JERSEY.

Whatever may be the difference of opinion with reference to the inclusion of going value in valuation for rate-making purposes, the inclusion of this item by the New Jersey commission in this case received the explicit approval of the courts of that State. The findings of the New Jersey commission with reference to going value was approved by the Supreme Court of New Jersey July 7, 1913. The court took particular pains to approve the inclusion of and the allowance for going value, saying:

"The controversy turns mainly on the allowance for going value and the refusal to allow anything for the value of the franchise. For going value or cost of developing the business, $1,025,000 was allowed. * * * The company insists that there should be allowed about twice as much, including preliminary expenses and cost of development.

"It is necessary, therefore, to determine first whether any allowance at all for going value is proper. We think both on weight of authority and on reason there should be such an allowance. (National Water Works v. Kansas City, 62 Fed., 853; 10 C. C. A., 653; 27 L. R. A., 827; Kennebec Water District v. Waterville, 97 Me., 185; 54 Atl., 6; 60 L. R. A., 856; Gloucester Water Supply Co. v. Gloucester, 179 Mass., 365; 60 N. E., 977; Town of Bristol v. Bristol & W. Water Works, 23 R. I., 274; 49 Atl., 974; Norwich Gas & Electric Co. v. City of Norwich, 76 Conn., 565; 57 Atl., 746; Omaha v. Omaha Water Co., 218 U. S., 180; 30 Sup. Ct., 614; 54 L. Ed., 991.) * * * The legal question is whether these items constitute a going value upon which the company is entitled to a return if the individual rate is to be just and reasonable. To this we answer yes. The argument addressed to us on the other side is that all the so-called going value appears in the valuation of the physical plant at the cost of reproduction; the suggestion is that unless there was going value the physical plant would be mere junk, and that the difference between the valuation of the physical plant at its cost of reproduction and its valuation as junk is the true going value. The argument seems to us specious rather than sound. * * *

"We think that upon the whole they reached a fair valuation. They took 30 per cent of the structural cost. This seems to be practically conceded to be fair; the difference arises from the fact that their estimate of structural cost was lower than the gas company thinks it should have been. No doubt fair-minded men may differ, but as the commissioners seem to have allowed the actual expenses proved and permitted the whole to be capitalized, even when paid out as current expenses from current rates, we think no injustice was done in this respect." (Public Service Gas Co. v. Board of Public Utility Commissioners, 87 Atl., 657 sq.)

The decision of the Supreme Court of New Jersey above cited was affirmed on appeal to the court of errors and appeals. (94 Atl., 634, and 95 Atl., 1079.)

It may be remarked in passing that it does not follow that the same measure of allowance, or necessarily any allowance at all, should be made for going value in the case of other utilities, including railroads. A gas company at its introduction must solicit and acquire the patronage of consumers by free installations, by free service, by exhibitions of the use of gas for cooking and heating purposes, whereas a trolley company, for example, would not apparently have to make similar expenses. Each particular case must be judged by the facts placed of record.

In short, the decision of the New Jersey commission in the Paterson-Passaic Gas case reduced the price to consumers, ignored the inflated face value of the securities, appraised the property with business attached at about half the amount claimed by the company, and has obtained specific approval by the highest courts of the State.

It should be stated in addition that the Paterson-Passaic Gas case is now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal. The gas company contends that the New Jersey commission made a wholly inadequate allowance for certain intangible values such as the company's franchise. The allowance of $1,025,000 by the New Jersey commission was an all-inclusive allowance for all intangible elements of value, and expressly excluded any allowance for franchise value except such actual outlay as might have been made in obtaining the franchises in question. No allowance at all was made for good will; and the measure of the allowance for all intangibles, including "going value," was based upon the evidence of a number of expert witnesses.

THE 5 PER CENT CASE AND THE WESTERN RATE ADVANCE CASE.

The opposition to Mr. Daniels's confirmation four cases decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission are reviewed. These four cases are the Eastern Rate Advance case of 1910, the Western Rate Advance case of 1910, the Five Per Cent case of 1914, and the Western Rate Advance case of 1915. (Ibid., p. 12.)

So far as the first two cases are concerned it should be stated that they were decided before Mr. Daniels became a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is also significant that in his dissenting memorandum attached to the first opinion in the Five Per Cent case Mr. Daniels took occasion to indicate his approval of the denials of rate advances in both of the 1910 cases. He said:

"In 1910 the railroad carriers in official classification territory and the principal railroad carriers in western trunk line, trans-Missouri, and Illinois freight committee territories filed tariffs advancing rates upon some hundreds of commodities. In official classification territory the proposed advances covered all class rates and about one-half of the commodity rates. The commission suspended the tariffs containing the proposed advances and entered upon two inquiries concerning the propriety of the increased rates. As the outcome of each inquiry the proposed rates were not found reasonable and proper.

"Upon the evidence presented in these inquiries such finding and conclusion by the commission was amply warranted. The year 1910 coincided with an unusual volume of traffic moving over the carriers' lines, so that despite the carriers' showing of various increased costs the simultaneous increase in tonnage and gross receipts was more than sufficient to offset the rising costs and to leave net operating income unimpaired."

The first of the four cases reviewed in which Mr. Daniels participated was the Five Per Cent case. On July 29, 1914, the first decision in the Five Per Cent case was made. The majority of the commission found in their report:

"Upon the record, found that the net operating income of the carriers in official classification territory, considered as a whole, is smaller than is demanded in the public interest; but that no showing has been made warranting a general increase in trunk-line rates, in rail-and-lake rates, or in rates on traffic moving in official classification territory." (First headnote to Report, 31 I. C. C., p. 351.)

In the body of the report (31 I. C. C.), on page 384, the following findings are made:

"In view of a tendency toward a diminishing net operating income as shown by the facts described, we are of opinion that the net operating income of the railroads in official classification territory, taken as a whole, is smaller than is demanded in the interest of both the general public and the railroads."

The majority opinion conceded increased rates in central freight association territory—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and southern Michigan, Commissioner McChord and Mr. Daniels thought that the increase should extend to official classification territory covering the States east of Ohio to the seaboard north of the Potomac River.

It shoud be observed in passing that the decision was made public before the outbreak of the European war and before the possibility of that event was contemplated. It follows of necessity that Commissioner McChord and Mr. Daniels, who dissented in that case, could not have been in anywise influenced by the results or the apprehended results of the war.

In October of 1915 the commission ordered a supplemental hearing in the 5 per cent case, and as the result adopted the view of Commissioner McChord and Mr. Daniels and extended the increase throughout official classification territory. Two commissioners, namely, Commissioner Clements and Commissioner Harlan, dissented from the second decision, but the remaining five commissioners concurred in it.

Exception is taken to what is characterized as the "startling views" expressed by Mr. Daniels in his dissenting memorandum attached to the first decision in the 5 per cent case, and in confirmation of this is quoted the following from Mr. Daniels's dissenting memorandum:

"Expected earnings constitute in the last analysis the bid which the carriers must make for new capital for needed improvements, extensions, new rolling stock, and similar purposes. It is not necessary to say that on such a showing the investing public will hardly be eager to intrust its funds to transportation enterprises. Where well-secured, long-time bonds bearing 4½ per cent interest command little over par, and where stock can be sold at par (these words in italics are inadvertently omitted in the quotation) only on the prospect of a much higher rate of return, it is clear that the carriers must make a better showing of net revenue before they can as a whole enlist large additional supplies of capital."

This quotation is unfavorably commented on, as follows:

"The meaning of this * * * is that no matter how exaggerated the basis of value may be, the rates must be such as will keep the stocks of railway corporations favorites in the market; that is to say, the people must pay for all the financial mistakes, crimes, and mismanagement of a half a century of conscienceless promotion."

The inference above drawn is perhaps completely refuted by the conclusion of Mr. Daniels's dissenting memorandum, where Mr. Daniels says:

"A living wage is as necessary for a railroad as for an individual. A carrier without a sufficient return to cover costs and obtain in addition a margin of profit large enough to attract new capital for extensions and improvements can not permanently render service commensurate with the needs of the public. Eventually it may come about that railroads will be owned and operated by the Government. That is a matter of public policy which it is not the province of this commission to consider. But that such a departure from the present policy of private ownership and corporate operation should be materially hastened by the reluctance of new capital to invest in these properties would seem to be a grave indictment of our present system of regulation and control."

It is a complete misapprehension of Mr. Daniels's memorandum to suppose that he advocated rates so high as to lift to par securities of carriers which, by reason of overcapitalization or questionable administration, were worth only a fraction of their face value. Mr. Daniels is speaking in general of future investments, and implies that if net earnings resulting from existing rates are unpromising there will be difficulty in future of securing the investment of additional capital commensurate with the needs of the shipping public.

In order to explain certain misapprehensions as to the Five Per Cent case it should be stated that the carriers in official classification territory asked what was in most cases a horizontal 5 per cent increase in rates. On some commodities where the rate was less than $1 per ton they asked an increase of 5 cents per ton. This was disallowed.

On certain commodities whose rates were then under separate advisement, such as anthracite coal and certain other commodities on which the carriers had not sustained the propriety of a 5 per cent increase, such as rail-lake-and-rail rates; rates on coal and coke, which had been increased in the not distant past; rates on iron ore; and rates held by unexpired orders of the commission, the increases were denied.

When, in the second report, increases were allowed, the carriers were required for a test period to ascertain by actual count the per cent of rate increase derived, it was ascertained to be slightly less than 3 per cent over what would have been realized if the rates had not been advanced.

Mr. Daniels, in his dissenting memorandum to the original report, said:

"In the conclusions of the majority report I am unable to concur. Except as hereafter indicated, the 5 per cent advance should have been granted in trunk-line territory no less than in Central Freight Association territory." (31 I. C. C., 434 sq.)

After reciting the evidence of record, including the rise in operating ratio since 1900 (pp. 441–445), there is a discussion of the burden of proof under the statute (pp. 448 sq.), where Mr. Daniels held:

"There exists a presumption in favor of interrelations in a rate fabric that have long continued undisturbed (p. 450). * * * With a demonstration of inadequate revenues, and with a presumption in favor of the propriety of the interrelation between rates long in effect, an advance moderate in amount, calculated to produce but a reasonable increment in earnings and affecting all traffic in the same degree, is the plain dictate of law and common sense in the premises" (pp. 450, 451).

Mr. Daniels also pointed out that this presumption had been rebutted in the case of lake-and-rail rates and in the case of coal and ore (p. 451).

Rehearing was had upon the case in October, 1914. The commission thereafter extended the relief asked, by according the horizontal increases, with certain exceptions, to official classification territory generally. Commissioners Harlan and Clements dissented, but the other commissioners approved the action substantially as suggested by commissioners McChord and Daniels in their original dissenting memoranda.

The grounds for the modification of the original report were as stated on page 327 to be the completed returns for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and returns for succeeding months; the war in Europe; and the results of the original order. (32 I. C. C., 327.)

The second report found that—

"These figures serve to emphasize our previous finding of the need of carriers in official classification territory taken as a whole, for increased net revenue." (32 I. C. C., 327.)

The second report, after reciting various forecasts of a financial character likely to result from the war, said:

"With some of these considerations we have, as a commission, nothing to do. Our powers and functions are those, and only those, conferred by Congress." (32 I. C. C., 329.)

At a later place the second report says:

"While we differ as to the relative importance to be attached to the various considerations presented, we agree in the conclusion that, by virtue of the conditions obtaining at present, it is necessary that the carriers' revenues be supplemented by increases throughout official classification territory." (32 I. C. C., 330.)

Mr. Daniels in his original dissenting memorandum held that the carriers had justified increased rates, with certain exceptions, higher than the then existing rates, and that the horizontal increase should extend throughout official classification territory. The majority of the commission in its original report confined the increases to central freight association territory, but in December, 1914, modified its original opinion and order so as to agree substantially with the position taken originally by Commissioners McChord and Daniels in their dessenting opinions on the first decision.

The fourth case is the Western Rate Advance case of 1915, which is criticized as follows:

"It involved the proposed increase upon about 200 commodities in a territory which is substantially but not accurately described as lying between Chicago on the east and a line running north and south through the United States through Denver. There are a great many railroads operating in this region, but, as everybody knows, a very large part of the business is done by a comparatively few systems, the names of which are familiar to every Senator. The opinion was delivered 'By the Commission.' I do not know who prepared it, but inasmuch as it reflects the views which Mr. Daniels expressed in his dissent in the Eastern case of 1913—views which are really the logical sequence of the doctrines held by the Utility Commissioners of New Jersey—it is quite sure that, if he did not write the opinion, he is largely responsible for it, and in any event, whatever else may be true he concurred in it."

Referring to the conclusion of the decision (35 I. C. C., 654–680), it will be discovered that Mr. Daniels, far from being responsible for the opinion in question, dissented from the opinion, in which view he was upheld by Commissioner Harlan, who also dissented, the dissent of the latter being printed on pages 680–681 of volume 35, Interstate Commerce Commission Reports.

The entire outcome of the 1915 Western Rate Advance case is singularly mistaken in the above criticism. Instead of according the increases there sought, it will appear by the headnote on page 497 that they were for the most part denied upon the commodities where any considerable amount of revenue was involved. This finding has never been reversed, and it will be learned from an inquiry of those who are acquainted with the situation that the decision was generally regarded as almost a complete defeat for the carriers which proposed the increased rates.

The Daily Traffic World, of Chicago, on August 11, 1915, headlined its account of the decision: "Western rate case decided. Only a few increases allowed. Victory for the shippers and disappointment for the carriers." The Traffic World (weekly edition) of December 18, 1915, after the commission had denied a rehearing of the case, printed an editorial which indicates the above view was that of Hon. Clifford Thorne, then chairman of the Iowa State Railroad Commission. An excerpt from the editorial (p. 1242) says of an interview with Commissioner Thorne as to certain alleged criticisms of the Interstate Commerce Commission contained in the report of the Iowa State Railroad Commission:

"He says in that interview that conditions have materially changed since the comments in the report (i. e., of the Iowa commission) were written, for since that time the Interstate Commerce Commission has refused a lot of proposed freight advances in the West and denied the petition of the railroads for a rehearing. He naively remarks that he feels quite different toward the commission (i. e., the Interstate Commerce Commission) after this decision in the Western Freight case from the way he felt after the decision on the rehearing of the Eastern case."

There were involved in this 1915 Western Rate Advance case three principal items: (1) Grain and grain products; (2) live stock and its products—fresh meat and packing-house products; and (3) coal. As will be found from page 504 of the report, these above-mentioned commodities involved $7,166,000 out of a total expected increase in revenue of $7,604,247. (35 I. C. C., 504.) The minor articles involved were estimated to yield but $438,000 of increased revenue in the aggregate. All of the commissioners, with the exception of Commissioner Harlan, adjudged that the increase on the grain and grain products had not been justified, and in this denial of the proposed increase on grain and grain products Mr. Daniels concurred. As regards live stock and its products, five of the commissioners voted to deny the increases, whereas Commissioners Harlan and Daniels approved the proposed increases. As regards coal, all of the commissioners concurred in the increases, which in no case amounted to more than 10 cents a ton. The aggregate increase of revenue permitted by the majority report amounted to about $1,600,000, or less than one-fifth of what had been asked, and amounting to about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the total freight revenues of these carriers for 1914. See page 662 of the report. (35 I. C. C., 662.)

It is further suggested that the characteristics of the 1915 Western Rate Advance case which it is remarked in opposition to Mr. Daniels's confirmation "stand out with especial prominence" are for the most part based upon a complete misapprehension of the findings of the report.

These characteristics of the report are stated as follows:

"First. It is made quite clear that, in the judgment of the commission, rates for transportation must constantly increase as the country develops, as population and traffic become more dense, and as the volume of commerce expands. * * *

"Second. The opinion seems to proceed upon the hypothesis that competent management, honest administration, favorable location, and considering a railroad as a means of carriage instead of an opportunity on the stock exchange, are no longer factors in the great problem of regulation. * * *

"Third. For the first time it was suggested that if intrastate rates, and apparently whether fixed by the States or the railroads themselves, are higher than interstate rates, this may be accepted as proof that the interstate rates are too low. * * *

"Fourth. There is another thought in the opinion which I have not been able to fully understand. * * * If this is to be understood as establishing the rule that rates are to be approved according to their 'propriety' instead of their 'reasonableness,' we have indeed lost all the landmarks of the law."

No specific reference by page number of the commission's report is given to illustrate the first and second points, and it is confidently submitted that there is no finding in the report in the 1915 Western Rate Advance case which can be cited in substantiation of the first two averments. The majority report, after a very complete analysis of the financial condition of the carriers involved, says at pages 565, 566:

"Up to this point we have discussed evidence of a general character, chiefly financial. As the views of individual commissioners might vary with respect to particular features and different degrees of importance to be attached to the same fact, our comments have been primarily narrative; they have been interpretative only incidentally and within the range of financial facts of record. No attempt has been made on the record nor in our discussion of it to review the entire financial history of these carriers, nor to bring into relief other facts which have an important bearing upon their present financial condition. In other words, this preliminary discussion leaves uninterpreted many consequential facts. However, in our view a wider examination in this respect is not necessary for a proper disposition of the issues involved regarding proposed increased rates. We proceed to the consideration of the particular tariff schedules in which it is proposed to increase the rates."

The third point makes specific reference to page 589 of the report. It will be found on examination that the commission is there speaking not of higher State rates but of lower State rates. Exactly contrary to the statement of the third point, the commission here declined to increase interstate rates because of the prevalence of lower State rates. An examination of the report (35 I. C. C., p. 589) will demonstrate the fact insisted upon that the statement in the third point has completely inverted the finding of the commission.

The fourth point contains a reference to page 589 of the report as to the construction of the word "propriety" in the act to regulate commerce. In this one instance no extended discussion is necessary, as it will be found by an examination of pages 674 and 675 of Mr. Daniels's dissenting opinion in this case, which has been apparently overlooked, the views of the critic are quite in accord with those of Mr. Daniels.

In view of the fact that the Five Per Cent case netted the carriers less than 3 per cent increase in revenue, and that the advances accorded in the 1915 Western Rate Advance case amounted to about $1,600,000, or about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the revenues of the carriers involved; and in view of the fact that in this latter case the commission made no finding as to the financial conditions of the carriers, and predicated no rates thereon, it is submitted that the result of what is designated as the "most notable contest ever carried on in the United States" has been mistaken.

On request of Mr. CUMMINS, and by unanimous consent, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the vote of the Senate on the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Daniels, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, together with the pairs, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 10, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art infinite in all Thine attributes, from whom all things proceed, help us to appreciate the dignity Thou hast conferred upon us as rational beings, that we may conform our ways to Thy ways, our will to Thy will, as revealed to the world amid the thunders of Sinai, emphasized in the Sermon on the Mount, by the parables which fell from the Master's lips, and in the example of His life; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1082. An act to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On December 27, 1916:

S. 7095. An act extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River," approved the 24th day of August, 1912.

On December 30, 1916:

S. 6116. An act providing for the taxation of the lands of the Winnebago Indians and the Omaha Indians in the State of Nebraska.

SETTLEMENT OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES.

Mr. BORLAND rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent to print as a public document a work that has just been compiled by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation on railway strikes and lockouts. It comprises all of the legislation of this country and all of the legislation of all of the Governments of the world relating to the settlement of industrial disputes and as to the control of public-utility corporations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks to have printed as a public document a volume compiled by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation containing the laws upon this subject of every country under heaven. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Missouri agree to withdraw his request and introduce a resolution and let it go to the committee in the regular way? I do not like to object, but I may have to.

Mr. BORLAND. I think that is the proper course to take; that it ought to go to the Committee on Printing. I simply want to say at this time that this is a book that in the immediate future is going to be extremely valuable to Members of Congress. It is the only place where the information can be found.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of compulsory military service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of compulsory military service. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Federal game law and regulations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Federal game law and regulations. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean the migratory-bird law?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is not the Federal game law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

ALEXANDER F. M'COLLAM.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two days in which I may file a supplementary report on the bill (H. R. 17781) in behalf of Alexander F. McCollam. I filed the report (No. 1234, pt. 2), but there was some information left out of the report which came from the department and which did not get in, from some oversight, and I ask that I may have time to file a supplementary report, in order that it may be included.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to have two days in which to file a supplementary report in the case of Alexander F. McCollam. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The unfinished business is House bill 15914. The House automatically goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] in the chair.

THE VIRUS, SERUM, AND TOXIN ACT.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15914) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15914, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15914) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill, H. R. 15914, is a bill which revises the act of 1913 relating to the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products used in the treatment of domestic animals. The act of 1913 was brought about by the use of serums in the treatment of hog cholera, and it became evident that in order to secure potent and pure serums all of the establishments that had to do with the manufacturing of this serum should be under the control of the Government of the United States. When the appropriation bill was up in 1913 we put into it the provisions which have since been known as the serum and virus act.

At that time there were possibly less than a dozen establishments in the United States that were manufacturing serum for the treatment of hog cholera. Since then the number has increased to between 80 and 90. We have now between 80 and 90 establishments in the United States which are manufacturing this serum and which are licensed under the provisions of the act of 1913.

In 1914, at the time of the breaking out of the foot-and-mouth disease, there was at least one place in the United States where it was thought beyond any doubt that foot-and-mouth disease occurred because of the fact that the hog-cholera serum contained in it the germs of the foot-and-mouth disease. The Department of Agriculture began at once investigations seeking to avoid the recurrence of such an evil, and I am glad to say that the Department of Agriculture has found a method of treatment under which serum can be made absolutely pure and all of the germs of any disease can be killed. That treatment is simply by a heating method, heating the serum up to a certain point, when all germs of any disease which it may contain will be destroyed, and that, too, without affecting in any way the potency of the serum.

This called to the attention of the Department of Agriculture the necessity of having a more rigid supervision of the manufacturing of serum, and this bill is brought in here to accomplish that purpose. I do not believe that there is any serious objection to the bill. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STEELE] introduced this measure, and he has taken great interest in it.

I now yield to him such time as he may desire to discuss it, and reserve the balance of my time after the completion of his statement.

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the virus-serum-toxin act as embodied in House bill 15914 is intended primarily to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to control the manufacture of serums which are sold for the prevention and cure of hog cholera. The United States Department of Agriculture and other scientific institutions have spent vast sums of money in research to discover the germ that has caused the death of millions of hogs annually for more than 30 years. This disease has resulted in loss and financial ruin to many of the hog producers of this country and indirectly has served to increase the cost of living to the many millions of consumers the world over through the resulting reduction in the pork supply.

A few years ago Dr. Dorset, a scientist in the employ and now the Chief of the Biochemic Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, discovered a serum that, when injected in a small dose, would immunize the hog against this fatal disease. After thorough scientific investigation and following successful field experiments the United States Department of Agriculture gave the formula to the public. Many competent and trustworthy veterinarians in the department, seeing the many possibilities of this discovery, resigned their positions in the department and proceeded to build establishments for the manufacture of this serum, which they sold at a price which was very remunerative to them. The hog producers of the country, believing that the Department of Agriculture would not recommend this serum if it was not trustworthy, made a great demand upon the few commercial establishments engaged in the business, and those establishments made enormous profits.

Upon this showing many unscrupulous men who knew little of the methods necessary to make pure and potent serum went into the business, and as a result of the action of these men much harm was done, and in many cases hog cholera was produced instead of being prevented. The untrustworthy and unreliable serum which was thus placed on the market created a distrust of the serum among the hog producers of the country, and even caused some of them to condemn the Department of Agriculture for putting out a fake remedy, which not only caused the farmers to lose the money spent for the serum but also the hogs which the serum was supposed to save.

The Department of Agriculture seeing this condition of affairs, and knowing that their serum would immunize hogs if properly manufactured and applied, requested the Congress to pass a law regulating the manufacture and sale of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products used in the treatment of domestic animals in order that the Secretary of Agriculture might be empowered to stop these frauds upon the farmer, and thus aid him in making a successful fight against hog cholera. Such a bill was passed by Congress in 1913, but since that time the practical application of the law has shown that it is weak in certain particulars, where the Secretary of Agriculture should have absolute control. Probably the greatest fault in the present law is that the Secretary of Agriculture is empowered to issue licenses and thereby give prestige and standing to a manufacturing firm without actually being in a position at all times to know that the firm is conforming to the regulations and the law. As I have said, it is of first importance to be sure that the serum is potent. This can be determined only by testing it on pigs. The bill which we are now presenting provides authority for the Secretary to control this test completely from the time of its beginning until it has been fully completed.

Section 4 of bill H. R. 15914, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for, and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes, reads as follows, to wit:

SEC. 4. That no license shall be issued under the authority of this act to any establishment where viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products are prepared for sale, barter, exchange, or shipment as aforesaid, except upon condition that the licensee will conduct the establishment and will permit the inspection of such establishments and of such products and their preparation and the examination and testing of the same, and will furnish all necessary animals, materials, and facilities for making such inspections, examinations, and tests in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The points which I wish to make clear are that the Congress has authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to issue licenses to plants for the manufacture of serum, but sufficient authority has not been given to the Secretary to enable him at all times to be certain that the products of inspected plants are potent and pure as the farmer expects them to be. There are still opportunities for unscrupulous men to evade the law. The present bill conforms entirely with the ideas which were in mind when the first bill was passed. It is simply a case of finding that the first bill did not serve to accomplish what was intended, and the bill which we are now offering merely corrects the defects in the original.

It is not necessary for me to show the necessity for a bill of this kind. The production of hogs is one of the greatest and most important industries of the American farmer, and the disease hog cholera has for years past caused greater money losses than any other single disease of live stock. It is said that these losses actually amount to from $25,000,000 to $75,000,000 a year, depending upon the prevalence of the disease. That progress is being made in the control of these losses is shown by the fact that on the 1st of January, 1916, according to the statistics of the Department of Agriculture, there were in the United States approximately 3,500,000 more hogs than ever before in the history of the country. It is also a fact that during the past several years hog cholera has been decreasing steadily, and there seems no doubt that much of this reduction in losses is due to the application of serum.

The Committee on Agriculture believes that the bill here presented will serve to further safeguard the production of this anti hog-cholera serum, and thus tend to a still greater reduction in the tremendous annual losses from cholera. [Applause.]

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KING. Has the gentleman provided in this bill any protection against anybody connected with the Bureau of Animal Industry or with the Government owning stock in serum factories?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. I do not think that question came up before the committee.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman remember that in the discussion of the agricultural appropriation bill at the last session, when an amendment of that kind was offered, a point of order was raised against it and it was suggested that it be placed in this bill, which it was proposed to bring to the attention of the House sooner or later? Does the gentleman recall that at that time he favored an amendment of that character?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. I do not remember as to that.

Mr. KING. However, there is no such provision in this bill at the present time, is there?

Mr. RUBEY. There is no provision in this bill that prohibits absolutely anyone connected with the department from owning stock in a factory, but I am satisfied that the Secretary of Agriculture, in the appointment of these gentlemen who inspect under this law, will not appoint anyone who is connected with any factory.

Mr. KING. I do not believe he will either, knowingly; but would the gentleman object to such an amendment?

Mr. RUBEY. I will read section 13:

That any person, firm, or corporation, or any agent or employee thereof, who shall pay or offer, directly or indirectly, to any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture, or of the United States, authorized to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act, or by the regulations made hereunder, any money or thing of value, with intent to influence such officer or employee in the discharge of any duty herein provided for, or which may be provided for by the regulations prescribed hereunder, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000.

Now, if anyone in the employ of the Department of Agriculture is a stockholder in one of these concerns, he is in effect violating that provision of this bill, because he is receiving money or things of value from the concern that manufactures that serum. I think that will cover it.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman think that that clause is sufficiently broad to prevent an employee of the Government owning stock in a serum factory?

Mr. RUBEY. There is no objection to the gentleman's proposition. If section 13 will not prevent it, we are willing to accept something that will prevent it absolutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman who has charge of the bill, or some other Member, explain the need of these various provisions which differ from the current law?

Mr. RUBEY. Would it not be better to take up these different matters paragraph by paragraph as they are reached under the five-minute rule?

Mr. STAFFORD. There should be an explanation at sometime or other. I notice in reading the bill that there are some very summary powers vested in the Secretary of Agriculture for the enforcement of this measure. Further, there is some machinery established which has not been created for the enforcement of any other measure. For instance, in section 6 there is a provision which imposes a burden, as I consider it, upon all interstate carriers to have a certificate presented with each shipment, certifying that the shipment conforms to the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture, before the shipment can be made. While I am in sympathy with the objects and purposes of this bill, I want to have some explanation made by some one as to the necessity of creating that very burdensome machinery and imposing it upon the carriers of the country, now and in the future, when there is at the present time an embargo upon shipments of various commodities because the railroads are not now able to transport the heavy traffic. By providing this mechanism you are only adding to the burdens of the carriers. I wish to be informed by the chairman or some member of the committee as to whether it is necessary to have that character of burdensome regulation in order to get the result aimed at by the supporters of this measure?

Mr. RUBEY. I will say to the gentleman that there is no trouble about that. These forms are all prepared by the Department of Agriculture. They are submitted to the manufacturers. It is only a matter of a few minutes to comply with these regulations, and I will say to the gentleman that as we take up this bill under the five-minute rule we can consider each of these paragraphs.

Mr. STAFFORD. My inquiry was not directed at the burden on the manufacturers, but it was directed to the burden which you impose upon the railroad carriers.

Mr. RUBEY. I understand that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is a shipment of some of this virus or serum in interstate commerce. Before that can be sent in the ordinary channels of transportation it must be accompanied by a certificate that the conditions imposed by the Government have been complied with.

Mr. RUBEY. There is no burden about that. The shipper, when he brings his shipments, brings his certificate also.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if the carrier receives the shipment without the certificate, it is liable to prosecution for a misdemeanor.

Mr. RUBEY. If the carrier gets the certificate, then it is relieved of any liability.

Mr. MOSS. Suppose a farmer slaughters animals on his own farm and proposes to send the meat into interstate commerce. That meat can not be carried in interstate commerce, if slaughtered on the farmer's own farm, unless a certificate is provided.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ah, the gentleman is a great authority on everything pertaining to agriculture, but he fails to differentiate that in the case instanced by him there has been no examination, and no attempt at supervision of the slaughtering of cattle by the farmer, but in this case, of the manufacture of serum, the department exercises supervisory authority over all these plants in the first instance, and imposes a penalty in case they do not conform to the requirements of the department. It takes away the permit to continue in the business, and the shipment then is made a penal offense. You have added a heavier burden upon an outside party—to wit, the carrier—which is not necessary as I consider it, and which only further obstructs the channels of traffic.

Mr. MOSS. The gentleman is complaining about the burden laid on the carrier. The burden is the same as it is on the shipper, and both are designed to protect the consumer of the product.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am pointing out a fact which the gentleman does not appreciate, that under this law by other machinery you seek to regulate the manufacture of the product and make it a penal offense in case they do not conform to the law. Now, you are adding an additional burden, an unnecessary burden, on the carrier.

Mr. MOSS. It is precisely the same burden that is put on the carrier under the pure-food law.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin state the burden that he is talking about and stay with that one proposition?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; as I read this bill I can not see any necessity for requiring a certificate to accompany the shipment.

Mr. RUBEY. What burden is that on the railroad?

Mr. STAFFORD. The carrier has to ascertain under the requirements here from a certificate that everything has been conformed to, and if the carrier fails to do that he is liable as a penal offense.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman is absolutely mistaken. If I make a shipment of serum, when I take it to the railroad I bring a certificate and deposit it with the railroad, and that is all that is required by this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why do you require that a certificate shall accompany the shipment for the carrier to ascertain whether it has met with the requirements of the law?

Mr. RUBEY. He does not have to do that. The certificate is all that is required by the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any other instance of any shipment in interstate commerce, where the National Government takes supervisory authority over the plant, where it requires that a shipment shall be accompanied by a certificate?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I regret the gentleman does not see fit to answer the question.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think everyone who has given consideration to the existing legislation relative to the sale and transportation of serum, virus, and analogous products for the treatment of domestic animals will agree that the existing provisions of the law are inadequate both for the protection of those whom the law is designed to protect, and from the standpoint of those who are charged with the administration of the law.

This bill does throw around the manufacture, sale, and transportation of this class of articles certain safeguards which are not in the present law, and to that extent I am in favor of its provisions. But, on the other hand, it contains what seems to me to be certain defects and certain injustices which ought to be remedied before the bill finally becomes a law.

The bill provides that before any person or corporation can manufacture or offer for transportation in interstate commerce any serum, virus, toxin, or other analogous products for the treatment of domestic animals the person or corporation must obtain a license to manufacture from the Secretary of Agriculture. As a condition of receiving the license he must consent to the inspection of his factory by the agents of the Secretary of Agriculture. He must permit the supervision of the process of manufacture in the establishment; he must permit a test of the product to determine its potency and its freedom from contamination by the agents of the Department of Agriculture, and all this must be done before he is permitted to remove the article from his establishment and put it into commerce between the States. In addition, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, he must place on the carton or container of the article the date of its manufacture, the name of the product, and the label indicating its potency, dosage, and so forth.

Now, what I am getting at is this: That under this bill the Department of Agriculture supervises the manufacture of the product and passes in the last analysis upon the potency and freedom from contamination of the article so manufactured. Section 2 in this bill makes it unlawful—for any person, firm, or corporation to prepare, sell, barter, or exchange in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, or in any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or to ship or deliver for shipment from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to or through any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to or through any foreign country, any worthless, contaminated, dangerous, or harmful virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product for use in the treatment of domestic animals.

In other words, although the Department of Agriculture has inspected the factory, supervised the process of manufacture, tested the product, passed upon its potency, and in passing upon it declared it to be potent and free from contamination, yet if any person sells that product and the product proves to be harmful or worthless, notwithstanding the inspection and test, he is guilty of an offense under this act.

My position is that if the Government undertakes to license the establishment, supervises the process of manufacture, tests the product for potency and freedom from contamination, and passes the product as potent and uncontaminated, it ought to be lawful for any person to sell the article or transport it anywhere. That is my proposition in brief. I shall later offer some amendments designed to carry out my ideas.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's position is that indicated by myself, that the supplementary provisions are merely burdens not necessary for the proper supervision of the operation of this bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know that I agree with the gentleman altogether—perhaps I do not understand his question. I will say that I do not think it ought to be an offense for a man who has no opportunity to examine the product and test its potency to sell that article in interstate commerce or transport it in interstate commerce after the Department of Agriculture has passed upon it and said that it was potent and uncontaminated.

Mr. MOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MOSS. Suppose the department has passed upon the serum and says that it is neither pure nor potent, and yet under the bill the department has not the power to destroy it, although it has the power to order it destroyed. Suppose, instead of destroying the product the firm sells it, does the gentleman think that that ought to constitute an offense?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; but this proposition goes far beyond that. Let me illustrate. Suppose the distinguished ranking member on the minority of the Committee on Agriculture, who lives at Northwood, Iowa, and who is a large farmer there, should send his hired man to Albert Lea, in the district I have the honor to represent, in the State of Minnesota, and this hired man should purchase of the druggist there certain serum which had been passed upon by the Department of Agriculture as potent and uncontaminated, should take it across the State line and use it there, and it should prove to be harmful or impotent, both the druggist who sold the article and the hired man who carried it across the line would be guilty of a crime under this act.

Mr. MOSS. Let me ask the gentleman the question, whether he does not seek to bring about the very condition that ought not to exist? We have in Indiana, and I presume they have in Iowa, many institutions that are manufacturing serum. So long as they do a purely State business they are not brought under the terms of this law. Suppose the conditions suggested by the gentleman exist. There is a druggist or other person who is selling serum which, under the terms which the gentleman states, could easily come across the State line. The serum has been manufactured in the State and is being manufactured and is sold for State consumption, and yet some one carries it across the line and offers it for sale. I would like to ask the gentleman if that man ought not to be brought under the law?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I would say so. He would be guilty of an offense in selling in interstate commerce serum not prepared in a licensed establishment. I say it ought to be an offense for any man to sell or transport in interstate or foreign commerce, within the classes specified in this bill, serum which had not been inspected and passed by the Secretary of Agriculture; but when the serum has once been passed and inspected by the Secretary of Agriculture, then I say that it should be lawful to sell and transport it anywhere.

Mr. MOSS. Does the gentleman believe under the terms of this bill that where serum has been passed upon, inspected by the Secretary of Agriculture, and has been delivered for interstate shipment, and a certificate given regularly, and that particular shipment having complied with all of the conditions of the bill the sale of it would entail a penalty upon anyone?

Mr. ANDERSON. I say that under this law a man who sells serum which is worthless or contaminated is guilty of an offense, whether the serum has been inspected and passed or not. I do not say that he could be convicted of that offense, because I do not believe any jury would convict any person who sold an impotent serum if that serum had gone through the necessary processes and had been passed by the Secretary of Agriculture, or that any court would permit him to be convicted; but, notwithstanding, under the terms of the bill the man is guilty of a crime.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman is well versed in this bill, I see, and I note his objection, if correct, is quite important. Will the gentleman kindly point out in what section a penalty might be visited upon a man who purchased the serum in Albert Lea and brought it into Iowa and there used it, if, mayhap, it happened to be impotent, worthless, or poisonous?

Mr. ANDERSON. Section 6 provides that no carrier or other person, firm, or corporation shall transport or receive for transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and so forth, any serum, and so forth, unless it is accompanied by a certificate showing that it has been prepared in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Here is a man who is transporting this serum or virus from Minnesota to Iowa, who has received no such certificate, and under section 6, technically, he would be guilty of an offense, assuming that the carrying of the article across the State line was commerce.

Mr. MOSS. If the gentleman were to strike out the provisions to which he objects, does he not believe he would take away all protection of the bill as to the conditions in which I speak?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Minnesota complains that the shipper must have a certificate.

Mr. ANDERSON. The carrier must have a certificate.

Mr. LEVER. The carrier must have a certificate that these products are pure and have been properly put up. I call the gentleman's attention to the act providing for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, carcasses, and products thereof, which are the subject of interstate commerce, and for other purposes, passed in 1891, where a certificate is required in all cases, and a vessel engaged in transporting these carcasses for export before it can get clearance even must have a certificate. Is not that an analogous proposition?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it is. I think there might be very different reasons for requiring a certificate in case of foreign shipment than there would be in case of domestic shipment, so that I do not think the proposition which the gentleman from South Carolina raises is analogous at all.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The position taken by the gentleman, as I understand it, is that a shipper in good faith, acting upon the security of the certificate of the department, could violate the provisions of this law?

Mr. ANDERSON. Absolutely.

Mr. REAVIS. That is, he would be held responsible for the mistake of another?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. And the mistake being the mistake of the very Government that would prosecute him for violation?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman states it much better than I have. I think, Mr. Chairman, that that is all I have to say directly with reference to the proposition, except that I expect when the bill gets under the five-minute rule to offer some amendments which I think effect the changes in the legislation which I think ought to be effected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What difficulty has the department encountered in operating under the law of 1913?

Mr. ANDERSON. Perhaps I can explain that best by pointing out the difference between this law and the other law. The principal and fundamental difference is this: Under the present law the Secretary of Agriculture has no authority to test the serum, virus, and so forth, to determine its potency or its freedom from contamination. Consequently the department can not and does not undertake under the existing law to pass upon the potency or freedom from contamination of the article. The concern that manufactures it undertakes to make the tests. It undertakes to guarantee the potency and freedom from contamination of the article. It takes the chances, notwithstanding the supervision of the Government, that the article may not be potent nor free from contamination. Under the present proposed law the department itself makes the tests; it undertakes to guarantee or to say at least that it has passed upon the serum and that it is free from contamination and is potent.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the gentleman refers to the authority conferred under section 4 upon the department where the manufacturers are even obliged to furnish the animals, materials, and facilities for the making of such inspection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any other similar Government authority which compels manufacturers to furnish the laboratory needs and to provide for this inspection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not that I am aware of, although probably there is something similar in the meat-inspection law. I want to say this about that, however: When this proposition was before the committee I had very grave doubts about the wisdom of the requirements to which the gentleman refers. I thought that the proper way to do this thing was for the department itself to furnish the animals and equipment and to make a sufficient charge in the shape of a tax upon the product to cover the cost of making the tests, but the department through its proper officials represented to the committee that they believed that these tests could be made effectively and efficiently under the provision which is carried in the bill, so I did not question the proposition further, although I still have grave doubts about doing it in this particular way.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is proposed by the department in carrying out this law? Is it proposed to have a laboratory in each manufactory or merely an experimental laboratory there to see whether the regulations are being conformed with?

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, no; the proposition, as I understand it, is to have an inspector at each one of these plants who supervises the process of manufacture. The tests made are actual tests upon actual animals, I believe, except a very simple one to determine contamination, and these tests, I believe, will be made at the factory. The original proposition presented by the Secretary of Agriculture involved the transmission of samples of these viruses to a general testing station located here in the city of Washington, where samples would be tested to determine their potency and freedom from contamination.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then these inspectors will be paid by the National Government?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, there are some hundred or more of these at the present time?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I think not as many as that.

Mr. STAFFORD. According to the report, which was dated last June, there are 90 regular licensed manufacturers, and they were increasing very fast, and I base my estimate upon that.

Mr. ANDERSON. If that is in the report, doubtless it is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. What burden will be placed upon the National Government with an inspector at each one of these establishments?

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, I am not authorized to speak for the Department of Agriculture, so I do not undertake to say how the department will administer this law and whether it will have one inspector at each factory or one inspector making periodical rounds. Perhaps the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STEELE] can enlighten the gentleman, and I yield to him.

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. As I understand, this serum is going to be tested on pigs. Now, I will read a letter from Dr. Melville which will perhaps explain what the gentleman has in mind. The letter is as follows:

Referring to your telephonic request this morning, I am inclosing herewith circular letter dated November 20, 1916, which contains the information you desire. You will recall that the serum manufacturer furnishes his own hogs for the hog-cholera test, and under present conditions they are not under the control of the bureau.

In order that you may have an abstract of the principal points in the above-mentioned circular letter, I wish to submit the following summary of the routine testing of hog-cholera serum:

Eight nonimmune hogs are inoculated with a cubic centimeter of hog-cholera virus. Two of those are injected simultaneously with 15 cubic centimeters of serum, two simultaneously with 20 cubic centimenters of serum, and two simultaneously with 25 cubic centimeters of serum, the remaining two being left as controls. If all of the serum-treated pigs remain well, whereas the controls become promptly sick of hog cholera, the serum is permitted to be marketed in doses of 20 cubic centimeters per 100 pounds. If, however, either of the pigs which received 15 cubic centimeters become sick, while those receiving 20 and 25 cubic centimeter doses remain well, the serum is permitted to be marketed in doses of 30 cubic centimeters for 100 pounds or less. If either of the pigs receiving 20 or 25 cubic centimeters of serum become sick, the serum is not permitted to be marketed.

Now, the object of this bill in section 4 is to give the Government absolute control of the test pigs with a lock and key, making the manufacturer provide these places so that in observing these pigs from day to day, if some of them get sick, the manufacturer can not pass out the sick pig and put in a well one that never had had the serum injected into it and in that way destroy the potency of the serum. The absolute object of this bill is for the purpose of the Government having absolute control of each and every pig for the 21 days during which the test is being performed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-two minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who desires to present an inquiry to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. STAFFORD. Permit me to direct this inquiry at the gentleman: I would like to inquire as to how often will these tests be made at the individual establishments?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Every time they have prepared a certain amount of serum they want tested in order to be placed upon the market.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand it requires 21 days to determine whether it is efficient?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then if it is necessary to have an inspector there whenever serum is produced, I suppose there will be one inspector assigned to each establishment?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Practically so, and perhaps not. It does not seem to me that it would require an inspector at each of the plants. Say at my town there are six manufacturing institutions. Now, if this veterinary who has control of this test has the lock and key he can go over the manufacturers' premises and see that these hogs are properly fed each day and observe their actions during the test. I do not think it would be necessary to have an inspector there continuously and at all times.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; but considering the operation of the Government, that they do not look always to filling in and dovetailing in the time of their employees so that they can have economy of service, does not the gentleman think in the practical operation of this law that there will be one inspector for each establishment even though he may not be there all the time?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. I should say I do not believe that would be true. I do not believe the Secretary of Agriculture or the Bureau of Animal Industry would permit the time to be wasted in that way if they could adjust it so that they could use him some place else.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any practical experience as to how often the average-size manufactory produces serum in the course of a year?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Really, I can not say, but I do know in the 80 or 85 manufactories it takes about 24,000 test pigs to test out the serum that is necessary to supply the market.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to how long after a certain product of serum is produced that it remains potent?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. As I understand, up to one year.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is mistaken about that. I talked with Dr. Dorset the other day over the telephone and he told me they had tested serum that was six years old and that it was found to be potent, but he thought under proper conditions that serum would remain potent for two years at least. Of course, it does make a difference as to the temperature and conditions under which it is kept.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The question was asked a moment ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin as to whether it would not require a separate inspector for each establishment. Is it not true that a number of these serum establishments are located in Sioux City, Kansas City, and St. Joseph, adjacent to the stockyards?

Mr. ANDERSON. A great many of them are.

Mr. REAVIS. And would it require more than one inspector at each of these places?

Mr. ANDERSON. Probably more than one; yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Would not one inspector, say, in Kansas City, be able to inspect all of these serum establishments there?

Mr. ANDERSON. I hardly think so; not and maintain that supervision and control of the processes and of the tests which the departments seem to think is necessary.

Mr. REAVIS. Would it require a separate inspector for each serum establishment?

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, possibly not. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would not speak if it had not been for the particular question which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asked in regard to the troubles at the present time in the operation of law which regulates and controls the manufacture and sale of serums. I would like the committee to remember that this serum remedy for hog cholera is based upon the theory that when a hog has had the cholera once and recovers it is immune the rest of its lifetime. It is to be remembered that the injection of serum into the system of a hog, unless it is first innoculated with cholera, does not grant immunity except for a comparatively short time. Therefore, with serum there is sold a virus, which is for the express purpose of innoculating the hog with cholera. The treatment seeks, first, to give the hog cholera by injecting virus and then to cure it by the use of serum. This treatment, when successful, bestows immunity to cholera during its lifetime. Now, necessarily, if the Government sends out instructions to farmers all over the United States to venture to innoculate their hogs with cholera, they will do so only when imbued with the confidence that they are to have a serum that will protect the hog by neutralizing the germs of cholera which have purposely been injected in the hog. Unless it is possible to give them pure serum, the department is playing with fire in advertising this remedy. And when it shall occur that the serum is not potent the farmer loses his hogs and a new center of infection is created. A whole neighborhood has been exposed to hazard because of a poor remedial agent. Science becomes destructive rather than helpful. This is precisely what happened in my district during the past year and under the operation of the present law.

One of my constituents, a large hog grower, sent out to the West—I shall not state as to what place, though I have seen the correspondence—and purchased virus and serum. He believed he was protected by the fact of governmental supervision of the plant making the serum. He inoculated his hogs. This occurred in Hendricks County, Ind., where the Government has an experiment station, Dr. Wickwire being in charge of it. These hogs took the cholera and died, the serum protecting none of them. The result was the farmer lost more than 75 hogs and introduced cholera into that neighborhood, though he had acted in good faith and was supposed to be following a scientific formula. He had knowingly inoculated them with cholera and given them serum which did not prove to be potent enough to protect his herd. This may happen any time impotent serum is used with the simultaneous method. He called it to the attention of Dr. Wickwire, who told him his hogs had the cholera, but that the Government was absolutely powerless to help him. I called this instance to the attention of the department and submitted the correspondence in the case; but the department could not call back his hogs to life nor reimburse him for his losses. That is one circumstance that has come under my observation during the time the law of 1913 has been on the statute books. Naturally we ask a more effective statute.

Now, if you are in earnest, and if Congress wants to make this remedy a success, it must be made possible for a farmer when he inoculates with deadly virus to feel that he has absolutely a remedial agent which will surely protect him. I want the Members, Mr. Chairman, to remember that the simultaneous treatment—the treatment which makes the hog immune during life—consists first in actually introducing the germs of cholera into the hog and at the same time injecting serum which has the power to protect the animal. Every time a hog is vaccinated with virus the farmer assumes the risk of bringing the cholera onto his own farm and into his herd. This is the reason why this bill presents an exceptional condition and why exceptional power should be given to the Department of Agriculture in order to make it possible for farmers to secure potent serum.

These facts must be borne in mind during the consideration of this bill. The serum is a harmless remedy. The serum itself does not introduce disease germs into the system of a hog, although it is supposed to give protection. But permanent protection can not be given to the hog by the administration of the serum until the animal has first been vaccinated or inoculated with the virus of hog cholera. The whole theory is that the vaccination or inoculation of the hog with the virus of cholera and the simultaneous application of serum makes the hog immune during its lifetime.

If you will hold that theory in your minds, gentlemen, you will understand this bill. The farmers of this country are asking that the Federal Government shall make it so that in the practical use of this remedy they can have a reasonable—no; not a reasonable, but an absolutely certain—protection against the constant hazard which it inherently carries; that if they introduce this deadly disease into their herds they will have a remedial and not a destructive agent at their service. That is the whole theory of this bill, and unless you are going to give that protection you had better prohibit absolutely the manufacture and sale of serums and viruses. We had better suffer from occasional invasion of hog cholera into our herds than to risk the very frequent outbreaks which may follow the use of impotent serums.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. HASTINGS. For how long is the hog immune if you give him the virus and the serum?

Mr. MOSS. For not more than three or four months. I am not sure that the serum will give ample protection for three months. I will repeat that in speaking of the virus you are speaking about a toxin that carries with it the disease of cholera itself, and that the serum is supposed to neutralize the cholera and give the hog protection. Necessarily a farmer only wants to do that once during the lifetime of his hog. Ordinarily the farmer takes a shote after it has been weaned, when it is of comparatively low value, and gives it the prescribed treatment—first inoculating it with the virus and then with the serum. If the operation is successful he has an immune hog; if it fails, he will have a hog stricken with cholera.

The current number of the Scientific American, one of the most carefully edited journals in the United States, in one of its leading articles, makes the statement that the farmers have lost from hog cholera on the average $40,000,000 a year in the last 40 years, and that in certain years the loss has reached the high total of $75,000,000.

I am proud of the fact that since I have been a Member of Congress the serum remedy has become publicly advertised and is being used to a large extent by the farmers of the United States. This result has been wholly due to the experimental field work which has been carried on in certain of our States. Until this very practical work was done, although it was well known that the remedy had been perfected by Dr. Dorsett, the public derived no practical advantage from his most valuable work. Fortunately it has passed to the point where vast numbers of farmers of the United States want to make practical use of this remedy, and their only hesitation is whether they can do so with safety to their herds. In this connection we should remember that there are at least 70,000,000 hogs in the United States, every one of which is liable under present conditions to have the cholera. The work before us is to make it possible for each and every hog to be vaccinated, and thereby stamp out this dread disease from every part and section of our Nation. This suggests the vast work of manufacture and supervision in order to develop a commercial remedy in which everyone will have confidence. Necessarily this result will call for very large activity on the part of the United States Government, and will demand a splendid administrative ability on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture.

This bill must be taken and viewed by the Congress of the United States in the light of the exceptional dangers that come with use of this remedy; that every hog treated must be subjected to a direct exposure to the dread disease we desire to control. Failure means not only a loss of the treated hogs but the spread of the disease. Either the serum must be supplied in ample quantity and of absolute potency or we should prohibit by law the exposure of hogs by inoculating them with cholera virus. Therefore I submit that the stringent provisions of this bill are amply justified and ought not to fall by reason of hypercritical objections on the part of gentlemen who are proceeding upon theory, and not on practical experience. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OVERMYER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article appearing in the Scientific American of December 30, 1916, relating to the inoculation of hogs by serum.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

INOCULATING THE MORTGAGE LIFTERS—HOW THE DISASTROUS HOG-CHOLERA EPIDEMIC IS BEING CONTROLLED.

[By C. H. Claudy.]

"Hog" is a term of derision or contempt for the man in the city. But the farmer calls his hogs "mortgage lifters," because the revenue derived from swine raising is responsible for much of farming prosperity, and because were it not for hogs and the profit they bring many a farm would go unimproved and undeveloped.

If one hog in a herd of a hundred dies, the farmer is sorry, but he doesn't tear his hair. But if the ninety-nine die the one that is left doesn't do him much good. A thousand, a hundred thousand, even a million dollars' worth of hogs might be exterminated yearly, and still there would be no great economic problem to face. But when, as happened in 1913, $75,000,000 worth of hogs die from a disease for which there is absolutely no cure—hog cholera—then, indeed, a wail goes up from the hog raisers.

At the present time there are 68,047,000 hogs in the United States. Their value is $571,890,000. The average loss annually due to hog cholera during the last 40 years is estimated at not less than $40,000,000. This is altogether too large a percentage to give up in one year to a disease which, while incurable, is preventable. And while the loss in direct dollars can be estimated the indirect loss, due to the discouragement of hog breeders, is without a price to set upon it, and no man can say what the public has had to pay because of the increased price of ham and bacon, which might have been saved were hogs freed from this, their greatest pestilence.

It was consideration of these things and realization of the urgent need for assistance to those whose greatest wealth was disappearing in dead hogs that made the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture begin in the year of greatest loss (1913) a series of experiments looking to the eventual control of hog cholera by quarantine, sanitary measures, and preventive serum treatment. These experiments extended during 1914, 1915, and 1916 to 15 counties in Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Tennessee, Nebraska, Missouri, Oklahoma, and South Dakota.

The treatment of almost a quarter of a million hogs in infected herds has demonstrated the possibility of saving from 85 to 90 per cent of the animals. A determined effort on the part of the proper State officials and farmers cooperating with the bureau can undoubtedly control and eventually eradicate the disease.

Hog cholera is an acute febrile disease which affects only hogs. It is extremely contagious. While it is found practically all over the world, it is especially prevalent in the hog-raising districts of the United States. It first occurred in 1833 in Ohio, supposedly from imported hogs from European countries. The disease has gradually extended to all portions of the United States along lines of transportation.

Hog-cholera mortality is 100 per cent in some herds, while the average is probably from 70 to 80 per cent. Hogs which survive are usually worthless. There is no cure for hog cholera. But it is preventable, and by a method which will ring naturally in ears accustomed to hear of preventive serum for human diseases. Starting with the fact that hogs which recover are thereafter immune, the bureau discovered that an immune, injected with blood from a sick hog, can provide blood which will protect other hogs.

The process is scientific and exact and its results wonderful. A vigorous immune hog is treated with much blood from a hog-cholera patient. After a week or two blood is drawn from the immune by cutting off the end of the tail. The fluid portion of the blood is mixed with weak carbolic acid, forming the serum which protects from hog cholera. It is used either by simple or by simultaneous inoculation.

In the first method an injection of serum alone is made inside the hind leg. This protects from hog cholera for several weeks. If not exposed to hog cholera the immunity gradually lessens in degree and the hog may again become susceptible. If, however, the hog is exposed to hog cholera within a short time after the injection of the serum, the immunity becomes of lifelong duration. In simultaneous inoculation the same serum is used, but there is also injected a small quantity of blood taken from a hog-cholera patient. This confers a permanent immunity.

So much for the facts. Now for the results. We give the figures of the Bureau of Animal Industry. Of the sick members of infected herds treated by the bureau's agents during three years, 28.8 per cent died; of the well members the mortality was 4.5 per cent among those treated by serum alone and 3.7 per cent among those enjoying simultaneous treatment. These results are indeed marvelous.

Hog-cholera work is by no means confined to serum treatment. Close study of 738 cases showed that only 177 came from indefinite causes. The rest were directly traceable to some source, often preventable. One hundred and forty-five cases were traced to birds, 110 to visiting infected premises, 89 to exchanging work with infected farms, 52 to dogs, 50 to exposure of well hogs to sick ones in adjoining pens or pastures, 41 to infection harbored from previous sickness, 10 to polluted streams, 30 to purchase of new stock, and 4 to infection on cars.

From an examination of these and other causes of hog cholera a simple set of preventive rules has been evolved. Farmers in whose neighborhood hog cholera exists are advised to follow implicitly these rules, which consist in nothing else than the application of common-sense methods of preventing the operation of the causes enumerated and in the adoption of decent sanitation in the homes of the pigs. The latter requirement may well be emphasized, in view of the still wide prevalence of the good old-fashioned notion that a pig is a creature of filth anyhow and will flourish only in filth. Nothing could be further from the truth.

These methods, together with serum treatment, have greatly reduced the economic loss, but the ideal of the bureau is the complete eradication of the disease. To this end at the present time intensive hog-cholera work is being conducted in 130 counties in 13 States, with a view to the eradication of the disease in restricted areas.

The system is to select a definite territory in each State, assign competent bureau veterinarians to such territories, who cooperate with State authorities. Because the disease is so highly infectious and incurable, the important part of the work is one of prevention. Special stress is laid on the importance of sanitation, guarding against introduction of infection, and the better care of swine in general. The facilities of the bureau are available whenever hog cholera is prevalent.

Mr. OVERMYER. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the article brings out quite pointedly the matters mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOSS], who has just concluded, and it brings out this further fact, which we must always bear in mind in connection with hog cholera, and that is that it is not a curable disease, and therefore all our efforts must be directed to preventive measures. When a hog once becomes inoculated with cholera that hog cholera is not curable unless you at the same time introduce the serum, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana. Hog cholera itself is not curable, and therefore our energies must be directed to preventive measures. This bill that we are now considering is along that line. It will insure to the farmers of the country purer and more potent hog-cholera serums.

The first appearance of hog cholera, I regret to say, in this country was in my native State of Ohio in 1833, and since that time it has caused losses in the United States aggregating as high as $75,000,000 in one year, and it is estimated that in the last 40 years it has caused a loss averaging $40,000,000 annually. Up until 1913 the Department of Agriculture did not pay particular attention to preventive measures in the matter of the sanitation of the premises and things of that kind. But since 1913 they have made studies along the line of preventing hog cholera by remedying the conditions and environment in which the animal is kept, and in conjunction with those measures and the use of cholera serums they have had very successful results.

In fact, this article to which I have referred states that the treatment of almost a quarter of a million hogs in infected herds has demonstrated the possibility of saving from 85 to 90 per cent of the animals. It seems to me that in these times when so much is said about the high cost of living, and when we are all cognizant of the fact that the price of meat, and especially of pork, is almost prohibitive, any measures that we might take to safeguard ourselves against this enormous loss of hogs are commendable, and any money that we may expend in that work is money well applied. I am heartily in favor of the bill that is being considered. [Applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio yields back the balance of his time. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill, if there is no one who wishes to occupy time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. MANN. I am asking for recognition. If the Chair can not see me, I can not help it.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MANN. To be recognized. I do not have to explain to the Chair what I am going to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman in opposition to the bill?

Mr. MANN. That is not the business of the Chair, whether I am in opposition to the bill or not. I do not have to explain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can wait a moment. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized for an hour in opposition to the bill, and the Chair was wondering whether or not anybody else could take his time.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Minnesota wants the time, I will yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asked to be recognized in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois ask the gentleman from Minnesota for time?

Mr. MANN. No; I am not asking the gentleman from Minnesota for time.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the circumstances the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 32 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. I am recognized for one hour if I am recognized at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman will not be recognized.

Mr. MANN. Very well, I will wait until you read the bill, and then I think I will be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule for Calendar Wednesday the Chair understands that there are two hours' debate, an hour for and an hour against the bill. Now, the Chair assigned to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] an hour for the bill and to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] an hour against it.

Mr. MANN. The Chair is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 32 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the bill. I do not think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], who has yielded me time, is opposed to the bill.

I have had some little experience in drafting legislation which came under the commerce clause of the Constitution. There are two methods, and perhaps more, by which Congress has control over commerce and manufacturing. One method is under the power of taxation, or licensing. One method is under the commerce clause of the Constitution, giving the right to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign powers. In the legislation which I have drafted I have endeavored to be very careful, and so far I think every piece of legislation which I have drafted has been upheld by the Supreme Court as constitutional. That is because the committee upon which I served was careful to come within the terms of the Constitution. This bill as it is written is not constitutional. Anybody can see that. That is, portions of the bill are unconstitutional.

I suppose it was drafted probably in the Department of Agriculture, a department which is wise in reference to agriculture, but never has known much about the Constitution, because nearly all the things done by that department are things not contemplated as within the power of the Federal Government under the Constitution. Nearly all of them are extraconstitutional. It is true that this bill in its last section endeavors, in a very sloppy method, which seems to have become popular lately, to save the constitutional provisions of the bill when the Supreme Court declares other provisions unconstitutional, because it says in the last section:

That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall, for any reason, be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder of this act, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

Of course the drafter of the bill, when he puts in that language, says to himself, "It does not make any difference whether I write a constitutional measure or not. I may by accident get something in it which is constitutional, and if by accident or design I get anything which is unconstitutional in it, that shall not affect the balance." I am inclined to think that when a provision like this reaches the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court says that the design of Congress was to accomplish a certain purpose, and that that purpose is unconstitutional, the court will say the act is unconstitutional, and will not merely confine it to saying that certain language in the act is unconstitutional.

There is no reason why a bill of this sort should not be drafted so as to be constitutional; not the slightest. There is no reason why an unconstitutional provision should be ingrafted in the bill. For instance, this bill provides properly that serums shall not be transported in interstate commerce unless they are manufactured in an establishment licensed by the Government. I think we have that authority. We have the right to say that when you want to ship anything in interstate commerce it shall be manufactured in a certain way, that it shall be labeled in a certain way, and shall come up to certain requirements of health. We have that right. But because we endeavor to regulate interstate commerce and to require these articles to be manufactured in a licensed establishment we have no right to say that that establishment shall not make anything for commerce wholly within the State. We have no control over that. We can not control the licensed establishment, except so far as it relates to interstate commerce, unless the establishment consents as a prerequisite to receiving the license. Now this bill provides——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I should like to know just what the gentleman means by his last statement.

Mr. MANN. Very well. The gentleman asks what I mean by my last statement. We can say to an establishment, "We will not license you to manufacture articles for interstate commerce unless you consent to certain regulations." I think we have that power. But we can not punish them criminally. All we can do is to revoke the license, and then forbid the shipment of their articles in interstate commerce because they have no license. Now, that is not the theory of this bill. At least, it does not stop there. It proposes to punish as a misdemeanor, by fine and imprisonment, a licensed establishment which permits the removal from the establishment in the State, not in interstate commerce, of articles the shipment of which in interstate commerce is forbidden. We have not that power.

Mr. Chairman, I have a cold and I need a little serum myself. I have often wondered why these great scientists, who claim that they have discovered serums for everything on earth, have never yet been able to discover anything which will prevent or cure a thing that most of us suffer from and which all the world suffers from more than anything else—a cold. I once asked the head of the Public Health Service if he could tell me how to avoid catching a cold and he said he could. He said, "Never go where there is a crowd of other people." I said, "It would be much easier for me to jump out of this window, six stories high, for then I know I would never have a cold after that." We propose, however, here to prevent and cure hog cholera and other animal diseases by the application of serum.

In section 3 it is provided—

It is hereby made unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell, barter, exchange, or ship or deliver for shipment as aforesaid, or, otherwise than in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, to remove from any establishment licensed under this act any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product for use in the treatment of domestic animals which has not been examined, inspected, tested, and passed in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

We have no such authority. We have no right to say that a manufacturing establishment in Baltimore or Philadelphia shall not permit the removal of anything it makes within the limits of the State, except as we may invoke the penalty of revoking the license; but that is not the method prescribed in this bill. If these people permit the removal of this serum within the State which we can not control, the bill proposes to subject them to fine and imprisonment, and we do not have that authority. We have no control over intrastate commerce.

Now, it was easy to have prepared a bill which would cover the case, which would say and stop there: "You shall not transport any of these articles in interstate commerce which are not made in a licensed establishment, and no establishment shall retain its license which does not obey the regulations which we prescribe." But we have no authority to say what a manufacturing establishment in one of the States shall do in reference to selling its articles in the State, beyond possibly our authority to revoke the license.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. LEVER. I have been following the gentleman's argument very closely and am much interested. What would be the difference in the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to withdraw the license which would be in the nature of a penalty, and making it unlawful for them to do certain things which the gentleman has been describing? Does the gentleman think the latter proposition would be constitutional if the first is not?

Mr. MANN. We have the authority to prescribe that these articles shall not be transported in interstate commerce except under certain conditions—relating to health. We have a broader authority under the decisions of the court in matters relating to health than we would have in reference to ordinary articles of commerce. We have the authority to require them to be packed and to be labeled in a certain way, to come to certain requirements if they are to pass the State line, and I think we have the authority to say that they must be manufactured in an establishment selected or licensed by the Government. There our authority ends. We have no authority to go into a State and say to a manufacturing establishment in the State: "If you make something wholly for consumption within the State, we will put you in prison for it." That is what this act says. If we assume such jurisdiction as that, what is there left for the States at all? If the Government of the United States, under the theory of regulating commerce, can say that a store shall not sell anything unless the Government of the United States permits it, under the penalty of fine and imprisonment, what is there left for the State to do?

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. LEVER. The language to which the gentleman is directing his remarks, page 3, section 3, says:

It is hereby made unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell, barter, exchange, or ship or deliver for shipment as aforesaid, or, otherwise than in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, to remove from any establishment licensed under this act any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product for use in the treatment of domestic animals which has not been examined, inspected, tested, and passed in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. Now, right there at that point.

Mr. LEVER. The part above that would fall within the power of Congress to legislate, and the gentleman's complaint is on the words "remove from any establishment licensed under this act." I was about to inquire if the court would not interpret the language to mean remove for interstate commerce rather than to remove for intrastate commerce.

Mr. MANN. You can not interpret it; that is what it says: "You shall not remove it." It is a very doubtful interpretation as to whether the sale above is confined to interstate commerce; it undertakes to say that you can not sell any of these articles, when the law is plain that under the law after an article passes into interstate commerce and the original package is broken Congress has no jurisdiction over it.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman knows that I make no pretension to being a lawyer, but, interpreting it as a layman, I thought the court might hold that the words "barter, exchange, or ship" meant barter, exchange, ship, or sell within the agencies of interstate commerce which are recognized by the Constitution as a matter over which Congress has authority, as well as the language to remove from the establishment, the court would hold that that meant to apply to the agencies of interstate commerce recognized by the Constitution. That was the thought that I had in my mind.

Mr. MANN. That is not what the act says. I do not know what the court would hold; it might strain the language or read something into it. Anyone reading the language would say that the manufacturer had no right to remove any of these serums from this plant—and he ought not to without having his license revoked.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman has raised an interesting question, but it seems to me that any administrative officer interpreting this act would certainly not put an interpretation upon it that he knew was unconstitutional. In other words, he would not do that which he knew the Constitution forbade him to do.

Mr. MANN. He would not know anything about it; even the solicitor of the department who drew the bill did not know what the Constitution provided—probably had never read it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELGESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HELGESEN. Would not the objection of the gentleman be removed by inserting, after the word "animals," line 17, "if transported in interstate commerce"?

Mr. MANN. The only way to obviate the objection is to redraft that provision in the bill. As far as construction is concerned, construction can do some things. For instance, section 2 provides—eliminating some language which is not essential to the point I am making—"no person, firm, or corporation shall prepare, sell, barter, exchange, or ship any virus until said virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product shall have been prepared," and so forth. Of course, that is open to construction, although the language says that it shall not be prepared until it has been prepared.

There are other defects in the bill which I desired to discuss along the constitutional line, but there is one that does not involve a constitutional question that I want to discuss. That is the provision putting a penalty on the carrier for carrying this serum that may not comply with the provisions of the act. Common carriers carry freight which is presented to them. That is their business. The less regulation we provide in the presentation of freight the cheaper are the freight rates. It is not the duty of the common carrier to ascertain the contents of every package which is presented to him. It would be a foolish provision to require every freight agent in the country when he receives an article of freight to have to examine an affidavit in connection with it and find out whether he was permitted to transport it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. If this was transported by parcel post it might render public officials liable to criminal prosecution, might it not?

Mr MANN. Yes. The person to make amenable to prosecution for the transportation of articles illegally is the man who commits the violation. He is the man who makes the shipment, he is the man who sends the article. You might as well blame a conduit pipe for carrying water through it illegally instead of the man who pours the water in. Under this provision a man who came over from Iowa to Rock Island, Ill., and purchased some serum and carried it back across the Mississippi River without obtaining a certificate would be liable to a year's imprisonment and a thousand-dollar fine. Of course he would not get it, for nobody would convict him, but there is no occasion, there is no demand for putting such a burden, not merely upon the carrier, but upon the shipper, and the inevitable result would be that the freight rate upon serum, if this goes into effect, will have to be raised. Neither the pure-food law nor any of the other laws which we have passed on these lines have attempted to put the burden upon the carrier of determining whether the shipper is complying with the law. If the shipper does not comply with the law he is the one to be prosecuted. If the consignee does not comply with the law and he receives articles, he may be prosecuted, but as a matter of fact the Government has no difficulty in holding these people responsible. If that serum is received somewhere the Government gets this information without trouble, and it can bring the prosecution properly against the persons who consign it. As a matter of fact, also, if a bill like this goes into effect, and I think some legislation should be enacted, there probably will not be any shipments of serums across State lines except those made in manufacturing establishments. To add any further burden to the shipment is useless and inexpensive. Why should a shipper every time he wants to ship an article of this sort at his risk be required to submit to the railroad company an affidavit for the benefit of the railroad company and then why should we require the freight agent of the railroad company to examine the affidavit and then at his risk ascertain if the article is wholesome and legal under the provisions of the act? I think section 6 of this bill ought to be stricken out and that it can be stricken out without in any way whatever affecting or injuring the value of the regulation of viruses as provided by the other sections of the bill.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to use any more of his time?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have no more requests for time.

Mr. RUBEY. How much time is left to each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has 27 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota 3 minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, this bill was prepared by a subcommittee of the Agricultural Committee. I was not a member of the subcommittee. However, I am more or less familiar with its provisions, and more or less familiar with the theory upon which the bill is built. I have been much interested in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I have so much confidence always in his judgment and fairness upon such propositions that I listened to him with more than ordinary interest. It seems to me, however, that if this bill is read as a whole and not by segregated sections the gentleman's fears may be met. The Secretary of Agriculture, under section 1 of the bill, is authorized to issue licenses to certain establishments for certain purposes. First, the Secretary is authorized to issue licenses in the Territories, in the District of Columbia, and in any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. That is the first proposition. The establishment must be located at a place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Second—and this is the point I am driving at—the establishment must be engaged in the manufacture of certain things for certain purposes. Those certain purposes are for shipment into interstate and foreign commerce. The gentleman from Illinois admits that Congress has the power to do that under the commerce clause of the Constitution. His objection is founded in the language on page 3, section 3, particularly that language which makes it a penal offense for any establishment to permit to be removed any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product for use in the treatment of domestic animals which has not been examined, inspected, and so forth. I want to call the gentleman's attention, however, to this language—"to remove from any establishment licensed under this act."

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. LEVER. I am reading from line 15. The only establishment that may be licensed under this act is such an establishment at such a place or under such jurisdiction and engaged in such work as is described in section 1 of the bill, and section 1 of the bill is not a stretch of legislative authority. I take it, not as a lawyer, but as a layman, that a court would interpret the language just read and the language immediately above as conferring no authority except such authority as Congress has the power to delegate to one of the administrative officers of the Government.

I do not know whether that satisfies even my own mind, because I am not a lawyer; but I would say this: That I do have a very great respect for the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, who was this morning personally asked about the proposition as to the constitutionality of this bill, and he informed the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] that he had gone into that phase of the situation very carefully, and he does not find any provisions which he thinks are unconstitutional. Of course, that is a matter of judgment between good lawyers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I remember several times through the plant quarantine act of other such instances, and really without any prejudice against them, if a first-year student in a law college could not have found it to be unconstitutional, I would think he was not qualified to study law. It was remodeled, and remodeled, and remodeled, and finally a constitutional measure was presented, but that department never thought it out. The gentleman said the objection that I made was to section 3. Take section 2, which is still more important. That was plain. The first part of section 2 prohibits the sale within the District of Columbia or the Territories. That is plainly within our jurisdiction. The second part of section 2 provides that no person shall sell, barter, or exchange any of these serums.

Mr. LEVER. "As aforesaid." I take that language to mean in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. MANN. You have already had a prohibition upon the sale. This is a prohibition on the sale, barter, or exchange. The thing in interstate commerce is the transportation, not the sale.

Mr. LEVER. I take it the gentleman's objection would be cured by the repetition of the phrase "as aforesaid," and that phrase "as aforesaid" relates to the uses and instrumentalities of interstate commerce.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is correct, the sale as aforesaid refers as to what goes before. Then it only refers to sale in the District of Columbia and the Territories and is an idle——

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. An idle and useless repetition.

Mr. LEVER. It says "or in any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States." That is the phraseology.

Mr. MANN. That is, States and Territories and applies to the District of Columbia, Hawaii, and Alaska.

Mr. LEVER. All States or Territories or the District of Columbia or through any State or Territory or the District of Columbia. That is the usual language describing interstate commerce, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that refers to the shipment. You do not sell through a State; that refers to the shipment. The effort is to say that you shall not sell these articles anywhere. We have not the power over that. After the package is broken we can not control it.

Mr. LEVER. That may be.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman has finished with his reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to ask the gentleman two questions on another matter. First, what, in general, is the evil that is intended to be obviated by the passage of this particular bill?

Mr. LEVER. I was just about to come to that. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I repeat I am not very familiar with all the details of the bill, but I am familiar with the general purpose sought to be accomplished by the bill. We know that hog cholera is costing this country from $40,000,000 to $75,000,000 a year, sometimes more and sometimes less. We know that if we are going in any way to affect the price of food products we have to do something somehow to increase the amount of meat foodstuff to be put upon the market.

Mr. TILSON. Right there, my experience has been that the great difficulty has been to obtain the serum at all, and it seems to me this is aimed at something else.

Mr. LEVER. I am coming to that, if the gentleman will permit me. What we are trying to do in this bill primarily is to save to the producers and consumers of meat food products of this country a loss of from $40,000,000 to $75,000,000 a year in their hogs. We are trying to prevent that loss, a loss caused by the disease known as hog cholera. The scientists know that we can practically immunize all the hogs of this country from hog cholera if the viruses and the serums are both pure and potent, and what we are trying to do directly in this bill is to guarantee a pure and a potent treatment for hog cholera.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman think we can accomplish that result by passing a law which is obviously unconstitutional and unenforceable in many particulars?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman has asked me a very frank question and I will answer him frankly. A subcommittee was appointed by the chairman to consider this bill. On that committee we had some good lawyers. I am not so sure but that I would be no more willing to trust the judgment of the gentleman from Minnesota as to the constitutionality of this bill than to trust some of the lawyers on that committee, although I have a profound regard for the gentleman's legal ability.

Mr. ANDERSON. That subcommittee gave no consideration at all to that question.

Mr. LEVER. The gentlemen on the subcommittee can speak for themselves; they are here.

Mr. HELGESEN. Does not the gentleman think the last half of section 2, beginning with "No person, firm, or corporation shall prepare, sell, barter, exchange, or ship or deliver for shipment as aforesaid any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous products manufactured in the United States," and so forth, would interfere with interstate commerce?

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman thinks so, it might be we can reach that when we come to consider the section under the five-minute rule. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman from South Carolina whether this would not take away from the States the power through their properly constituted authorities to regulate the manufacture and preparation of serum, such as is provided in this bill?

Mr. LEVER. I think not. I do not think we can interfere with the States in the conduct of their business for intrastate commerce. If the bill undertakes to give that power, we might as well quit and——

Mr. MADDEN. The language of the section says "No person, firm, or corporation shall prepare, sell, barter, exchange, or ship or deliver for shipment as aforesaid any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous products manufactured within the United States for use in the treatment of domestic animals unless and until said virus, serum, toxin, or analogous products shall have been prepared under and in compliance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture at an establishment holding an unsuspended and unrevoked license, issued by the Secretary of Agriculture as hereinafter authorized."

Mr. LEVER. The language "hereinafter" relates to section 1 of the act, which fixes the kind of establishment that may be licensed at all, and only such establishments can be engaged in the manufacture and sale of these products as are for interstate commerce or foreign commerce. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman think it would be perfectly easy to prepare a bill which would cover all that is necessary for the purposes sought and still have one as to which there would be no doubt of its constitutionality? I see no reason why we should go into these doubtful questions at all, assuming them to be doubtful. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Illinois in what he said and would go a little further with my doubts than he did.

Mr. LEVER. Well, I did not go into the constitutionality of this proposition myself. I will say to the gentleman I referred this matter to a subcommittee, and I have great confidence in the legal judgment of that subcommittee, and also that of the Solicitor of the department, and, while I do not know, I have faith in the constitutionality of this proposition.

Now, just one other feature, gentlemen, and then I am through. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] complained somewhat earlier in the day that we placed an unusual burden upon the railroad companies in that we required them to have a certificate from the shipper that his product, being offered for shipment, had been manufactured under proper conditions. The answer to that is the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] in his statement. We are dealing with an extraordinary situation here. Hog cholera is a highly infectious disease. Hog-cholera virus and serum can carry even other diseases than hog cholera itself. It is supposed, I think, that the recent outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease was caused from impure hog-cholera serum; that is, it had the foot-and-mouth disease germs in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. How much time is there remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is not an offense under this act to deliver to the common carrier any of this virus or serum without presenting a certificate. Now, how is the railroad company going to know, if a package is not labeled, and it is not required to be labeled, whether it contains this virus or not?

Mr. LEVER. The railroad company, I will say to my friend, must put itself on guard in a situation of this kind and see that it is not going to violate the law.

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the necessity for it?

Mr. LEVER. The necessity for it is that unless you throw around this the most stringent safeguards somebody, somehow, is going to get into interstate commerce shipments that are either impure or impotent, which would cause the loss suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] in his own district, or you are going to get impure stuff or contaminated stuff, which may cause another outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease. So I feel that we can go rather far in restrictive measures on a proposition involving that great danger.

Mr. STAFFORD. Every container in interstate commerce must contain the name of the manufacturer, the date of manufacture of this serum, and, if some of the serum happens to get into interstate commerce that has not been manufactured in an establishment that has a permit, why can not the department then ferret out the manufacture and punish him under the penal provisions of this statute?

Mr. LEVER. Well, we want every agent on his tiptoes to see that nothing impure, contaminated, or impotent is going to get into interstate commerce.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are you not going too far? Would you put an undue hardship on the carriers when it is not necessary? You are taking supervisory control over these establishments. You are giving the department full power to determine the character of the establishment or the conditions prevailing in the establishment; and if they do not conform to the requirements laid down by the Secretary of Agriculture the manufacturer goes out of business without any appeal whatsoever. His establishment is closed up. I do not recall an instance where such great powers are vested in the Secretary of Agriculture for the enforcement of this act if they do not conform to the requirements as laid down by him.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is taking all my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not want to do it; but it is a serious question.

Mr. LEVER. It is a serious question. I called the gentleman's attention a moment ago to the fact that the Secretary is now given authority under the act relating to the matter of exportation of these animals to prohibit the clearance of a ship unless the ship is furnished with a certificate of the health of the animals. We are not doing any more in this bill for our domestic commerce and the protection of it than we are doing now in the protection of foreign commerce for foreign countries. In addition to that, in the act of 1903 for the prevention of the spread of contagious diseases of live stock, and other purposes, the Secretary of Agriculture may require, and does require, a certificate of freedom from disease of the individual before he can move his cattle or hogs across a State line, and, as well, requires the same certificate of a shipper. So that this is not an unprecedented proposition at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman, I suppose, would be willing to concede that it would be easy to discover the disease in the animal before the shipment was made, and hence——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I will answer that question under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is within the control of the committee.

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. MADDEN. Hence the transportation company will be able to obtain the information as to whether the disease existed in the animals or not, but it can be well conceived how impossible of ascertainment that information would be in the case of a sealed package, for example. What right would the shipping company have to open a sealed package and make a chemical analysis of it?

Mr. LEVER. It would not have that right at all. All they would have to do would be to demand of the shipper, if they had suspicion that this was a package of serum, a certificate that it had been put up under the rules and regulations promulgated under this act.

Mr. MADDEN. There would not be anything, then, to prove it was not contaminated in some way?

Mr. LEVER. That relieves him. All he has to do is to have a certificate.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated a few minutes ago that cases had been discovered where serum had been shipped and used, and that foot-and-mouth disease had resulted from the use of the serum which was intended for another purpose.

Mr. LEVER. But this certificate is an absolute protection to the shipper. He is not held guilty if he can show he has received a proper certificate from the shipper. That is really a protection to the carrier.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for one more question.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. That is in regard to section 13. What is the terrible evil anticipated here that has caused this penalty for bribery to be put in—the penalty of $5,000 fine or two years' imprisonment, or both? Is there any danger in particular that is imminent requiring such severe penalties?

Mr. LEVER. No; not that I know of, except that we are trying to throw all of the extraordinary precautions around the manufacture of this serum and this virus that it is possible for us to conceive, because of the highly infectious nature, not only of the disease itself and of the virus which we are putting into interstate commerce, but because of the fact that it may carry other highly infectious diseases. We are trying to go to the very limit of restrictions here in its use in commerce.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to imply a lack of confidence in the officers of the Department of Agriculture. In fact, the provision for such penalties as are here imposed is somewhat unusual, especially where Government officials are concerned.

Mr. LEVER. It is unusual because we are dealing here with an unusual situation all the way through.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HELGESEN. Is there not an important thing in regard to the carrier that is overlooked? That is the fact that the serum will be handled by the drug trade. Now, suppose in a general drug shipment there will be some serum included without a certificate as to the serum. In that case they would be held unless there is that certificate.

Mr. LEVER. Well, the railroad company must be on its guard about that. It is up to the railroad company to keep its own skirts clean.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left upon the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes remain to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in the beginning, in 1913, when the first bill was prepared, it was prepared in the Agricultural Department. It was based upon the act which was passed by Congress in 1902, which related to the serum and virus that were used for the treatment of the human family. That act has been upon the statute book since 1902. The act of 1913 was founded upon that act and followed it almost word for word in its language; many of the provisions contained in the bill which we now have before us for consideration, and to which some objections have been made as to their constitutionality, are in the same language, almost word for word, as is employed in the Adamson Act which was passed a few days ago and which referred to the serums, toxins, and analogous products which are used for the treatment of the human family.

Now, there are many of us on the Committee on Agriculture who are not lawyers. We must depend upon others for our information as to the constitutionality of any given provision. The subcommittee which had charge of this bill had upon it one or two prominent attorneys, who went into that matter carefully. Not only that, but the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, who is an eminent lawyer, has given this bill his very careful consideration. He has had it under consideration a number of times. We have consulted him upon this proposition and upon that proposition, and he has given it as his opinion that there is no question in the world as to the constitutionality of this bill.

Now, further I can not say, because I am not a lawyer, and I do not know. But as a layman, and looking at it from my standpoint as a layman and comparing it with other measures that have been passed by this body, and whose constitutionality, it seems, has never been questioned, it does seem to me that this measure is constitutional.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows of any particular feature in this bill that is not embodied in the act of 1902 relating to toxins, serums, and so forth, used for the human family?

Mr. RUBEY. Well, there are some.

Mr. SLOAN. What are they?

Mr. RUBEY. There is one relating to the shipment and labeling, and some things of that sort.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it merely a matter of shipping?

Mr. RUBEY. The bill goes a little more into detail, and has in it some things that are not in the other bill.

Mr. SLOAN. I was directing my question to the purpose of simplifying the consideration, because I understood at the beginning that this bill as drafted intended to follow the act of 1902 relating to toxins, serums, drugs, and so forth, for use in the human family, and that it was not to seriously depart from that act.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not think there are any provisions in this bill whose constitutionality is questioned differing from the provisions of the other bill, except perhaps in one particular.

Mr. SLOAN. What was that?

Mr. RUBEY. I think it possibly related to the shipment. I am not sure.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has three minutes. If he does not desire to use it, the Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue licenses for the maintenance in the District of Columbia, the Territories, or any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, of establishments for the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals and for the maintenance in any State of establishments for the preparation of such viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products for shipment from such State to or through any other State, or to or through any Territory or the District of Columbia, or to or through any foreign country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman in charge of the bill state how many licenses are likely to be used under this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To strike out the last word.

Mr. RUBEY. About 90 have been licensed under the old bill, and probably that many would be licensed under this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are they all manufacturers?

Mr. RUBEY. They are manufacturers, making this serum.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where are they located?

Mr. RUBEY. Principally in the live-stock centers—Kansas City, Omaha, Chicago, and other centers of that sort to which live stock is shipped, although there are serum plants in nearly every State.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The terms are general here. They are made to apply only to the treatment of domestic animals. That might include cats and dogs as well as hogs and horses. I wanted to know if this would extend so far as to require a druggist dealing in these serums and toxins to take out a license?

Mr. RUBEY. Not unless he became a manufacturer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It might be that a druggist would prepare some of these things.

Mr. RUBEY. If a druggist prepared something and sold it as a serum, he would come under this act unquestionably. Instead of being a druggist, he would then become a manufacturer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. "Analogous products" might be widely and liberally interpreted by a man who wanted to go into the business and did not come under the license contemplated in the law.

Mr. RUBEY. Under the act of 1913 we have had no trouble along that line.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mention it because in the antinarcotic law the effort was made to register everybody who dealt in the articles referred to, and there has been some complaint about the operation of that law.

The gentleman thinks it is entirely covered?

Mr. RUBEY. I think it is entirely covered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it would not apply to druggists?

Mr. RUBEY. I think not at all.

Mr. SLOAN. It would apply to druggists if they dealt in interstate commerce.

Mr. RUBEY. If the druggist was a manufacturer of the article——

Mr. SLOAN. Or if he sold it in interstate commerce.

Mr. ANDERSON. If he delivered it for shipment in interstate commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to prepare, sell, barter, or exchange in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, or in any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or to ship or deliver for shipment from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to or through any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to or through any foreign country, any worthless, contaminated, dangerous, or harmful virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product, for use in the treatment of domestic animals. No person, firm, or corporation shall prepare, sell, barter, exchange, or ship or deliver for shipment as aforesaid any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product manufactured within the United States for use in the treatment of domestic animals unless and until said virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product shall have been prepared under and in compliance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, at an establishment holding an unsuspended and unrevoked license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, as hereinafter authorized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: On page 2, line 11, strike out all after the word "country," in line 11, and lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, including the word "aforesaid," in line 15.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offer is directed to the specific defect to which I called attention in the general debate. The section under consideration makes it an offense for anyone to sell, or to deliver for shipment in interstate and foreign commerce, any virus, serum, and so forth, which may be harmful, contaminated, or impotent, regardless of whether the article has been inspected and passed by the Department of Agriculture. As I stated before, it seems to me that when the article has been inspected and passed by the department, and so declared to be potent and free from contamination, it ought to be lawful to sell it anywhere, or to transport it anywhere in the United States.

I think the amendment also cures, in part at least, the defect to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] directed the attention of the committee, because it does limit the effect of the section to the sale of an article in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, or its delivery for shipment in interstate commerce, or its transportation in interstate commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In connection with the gentleman's remarks I should like to inquire a little further with reference to a matter stated in the report. The report states that the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease was connected with or brought about by reason of infected virus.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But it does not state whether this virus was shipped in interstate commerce by reason of the insufficiency of the present statute, or by reason of the failure to inspect the virus, through the insufficiency of the present statute. Can the gentleman give me any information on that point?

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not. I can say this, however, that since that outbreak the department has adopted a very simple process or test, which enables it to eliminate the possibility of the presence of the germs of foot-and-mouth disease in the serum.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then to go further, seeing that the gentlemen who have charge of the bill have not stated it, so far as I am aware, is the gentleman able to give the committee any reason for all this elaborate machinery that is provided for in this bill, for this repetition of penalties in various forms, for this effort, as the gentleman from South Carolina stated, to throw around the manufacture of this serum every possible restriction that could be thought of. Those may not be his exact words, but that is substantially the idea.

Mr. ANDERSON. The reason is this, that under the present law it is possible that contaminated serum might find its way into commerce, because the department does not have absolute control over the tests. Under the present law the department does not make the test, and it can not be absolutely certain that the processes of manufacture will be such that the tests applied will be sufficient and that the animals used will be of such a character as to make it certain that the product when the serum enters into commerce will be free from contamination and will be potent; but it is expected under this bill, under which the department does make the tests, that the department will be able to say absolutely that the product is potent and free from contamination.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is coming to the point which I desire to reach. Would it not be sufficient to add to the present law a provision providing for this test, in addition to the provisions of the present law, which require the factories to be licensed and to be under the control of the Government?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it would be sufficient simply to ingraft on the present law the requirement that the department shall make the test. I think it is absolutely essential that there should be some requirement that the manufacturers be licensed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is in the present law, is it not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Under the present law they are licensed, but the license does not give the department the control which it will have under the proposed legislation.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I be permitted to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is there any reason why this provision as to viruses, serums, and analogous products might not be extended to all medicines, so as to have medicines manufactured only in establishments licensed by the Government?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is leading me to a field into which I do not want to go.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The field is not led into by me. It is led into by the bill. I will ask the gentleman whether the bill does not necessarily constitute a serum trust?

Mr. ANDERSON. My answer to that is that I do not think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I should like to say just a word or two, but I will yield further.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In line with the questions put by the gentleman from Iowa, does not the Secretary of Agriculture, in his letter dated June 7, answer as to why the Government does not enter upon these tests on its own account?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Government is entering on these tests on its own account through this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not take the time of the gentleman to read it, but on page 7 of the report will be found a statement by the Secretary of Agriculture saying that these test establishments should not be created, because of the expense.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman has not been here during all the debate. If he had been he would have heard my statement that originally the Secretary recommended that test stations should be established, which would be under the full control of the Government, where samples of all the serums could be brought and tested, and the purity and potency of the serums definitely ascertained. In this bill it is provided that the tests may be conducted in the establishment where the products are manufactured, which was not at first proposed to be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the private establishment?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In this letter of June 7, 1916, written by Secretary of Agriculture Houston, quoted on page 7 of the report, it is stated that—

> In view of these circumstances it is questionable whether the establishment of test stations at this time is advisable.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the purpose is to make tests in the establishment, but not to establish an elaborate scheme of central test stations for the purpose of making the tests.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to read two or three sentences from the Secretary's letter?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (reading)—

> In contemplation of the authorization of Government test stations, as recommended in the report, the department made careful estimates of the cost of establishing and maintaining a sufficient number of them adequately to carry out the purposes intended to be effected. It was found that the expense would be very large. The initial appropriation needed, it was estimated, would be several hundred thousand dollars, which would have to be supplemented by a considerable annual appropriation.
> In view of these circumstances it is questionable whether the establishment of test stations at this time is advisable.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is what I said. It is a question of the establishment of test stations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that the Government prepares some of these serums itself and has test stations?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not; there are States that have commercial stations, but I think the Government has not.

Mr. SLOAN. The Government prepares some of this serum near Ames, Iowa, but not for commercial purposes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota will not be agreed to. He proposes to strike out the words, in effect, "that no person, firm, or corporation shall prepare, sell, barter," and so forth. The very moment you allow the unrestricted sale of this serum you are taking away from the manufacturer the responsibility that should rest upon him. Whenever you have licensed a manufacturer all he has to do to get rid of responsibility under this amendment is to get it into somebody's hands who can sell it wherever he pleases and not be subject to the provisions of this act.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman think it ought to be an offense for a man to sell an article which the Government that will prosecute him says is all right, potent and free from contamination? That is what this bill does.

Mr. RUBEY. The Government makes the test, but the article may go into the hands of unscrupulous purchasers who can sell where they please and not be subject to punishment under this act under the gentleman's amendment. The act of 1913 contains the identical language which this bill contains and which the gentleman wants to strike out. The act of 1902 contains in substance the same language that is in this act. There has been no criticism and no objection to those acts which contained this language.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If that bill the gentleman alludes to worked well, why do we need this bill?

Mr. RUBEY. Because we are giving additional authority to the Secretary of Agriculture for supervision at the factory.

Mr. MANN. That is the very thing. The bill to which the gentleman alludes has not worked well because it confines it practically to forbidding the sale of worthless serum. Here is a bill where you propose to make it work well by requiring that all shipments shall be tested before they go out of the manufacturer's establishment, and yet you say that no one shall sell worthless serum. What is the need of that? Are you going to put a man on notice when he buys a serum that is tested and approved by the Government that he is to make an examination of it and see whether it is worthless or not? If the inspector has not performed his duty, why should we hold the man who suffers from getting worthless serum criminally responsible?

Mr. RUBEY. My idea is that the moment you adopt this amendment you take away the responsibility of the manufacturer.

Mr. MANN. No; you put the responsibility on the manufacturer. You take it away from the dealer and make the manufacturer liable. Why should you hold the dealer responsible? The present theory of the law is to hold the dealer liable. That has not worked satisfactorily. You ought to let the dealer go free if he has a package tested and inspected by the Government. That is what you ought to do; but you still retain the provision against the dealer.

Mr. RUBEY. I think we ought to retain both and look after the dealer as well as the manufacturer.

Mr. MANN. Your bill does not even contain the provision which was put in the pure-food law, that the dealer can obtain a guaranty from the manufacturer and so trace it back. Here the dealer who takes the Government test and the Government certificate may be sent to jail because he believed the Government was attending to its duties. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. RUBEY. If an unscrupulous person gets hold of a serum that has been manufactured, he might dilute it or take the stamp off or counterfeit it, and you could not get at him in any way whatever.

Mr. MANN. That ought to be made an offense.

Mr. RUBEY. It will be an offense under this act.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. It is no offense to do anything he pleases with it under this bill as it stands; otherwise it would be an offense to transport any serum in interstate commerce. We have no control over transportation in intrastate commerce. A man in Chicago who purchases this serum in Detroit can do what he pleases with it after it reaches Chicago. He can swindle all the people in the State of Illinois that he pleases and we could not reach him. That is the duty of the State of Illinois; but you undertake to punish the man who legitimately believes the Government has made a proper test.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman from Missouri, who has charge of the bill. I think he has not examined carefully the distinction which has been drawn by the gentleman from Minnesota, or he would not say that the present law contains the same provision in the same language. It does contain the same words, but those words are all in one sentence, which contains the words "unless and until said virus, serum, toxin," and so forth, "shall have been prepared under and in compliance with the regulations," and so forth.

Now, in the present bill there is a period and a new sentence before these words that I have last read. They certainly apply only to the words contained in the particular sentence. They do not reach back and apply to the words which are sought to be modified by the gentleman from Minnesota, and I am quite sure that the department, or whoever drew the former bill, never intended that that portion should be an absolute and complete regulation in and by itself, but only as used in connection with the language found in the last part of the sentence in the present law; that is, unless and until such serum was prepared and in accordance with the directions and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. As long as these two parts are separated in the present bill it seems to me quite clear that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota ought to prevail.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a question of common honesty and nothing more. There are two parties to every commercial transaction—the producer and the consumer. I am now looking after the interest of the man who consumes the virus and serum. The pertinent question is, Why should any man be permitted to sell worthless or contaminated virus or serum to the farmers of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. Not just now. And then, when you remember that this virus is carrying the germs of the most deadly disease that can be contracted by hogs, the question becomes doubly important. One of two things ought to happen. Either it ought to be made impossible for a man to sell impure virus and impotent serum or else Congress should prohibit the manufacture and sale of it altogether; otherwise it is that the very dependence on the remedy which will spread the disease. There is no question about that. This law is based upon the theory that it is possible by test to determine whether the virus is pure, and whether the serum is potent. That being true, the man who manufactures it ought to have placed upon him the responsibility of making that test, and he should be permitted to sell only a product which is pure and potent. But here comes a proposition that because it is proposed to license the manufacture of serum and give the power of supervision to the Government, that this action shall relieve the manufacturer of what ought to be an inherent obligation to deliver only that product which he advertises for sale, and that the only protection the purchaser may have will come from the supervision exercised by the Federal Government.

Mr. ANDERSON. The manufacturer does not make the test under this law. The Government does.

Mr. MOSS. The manufacturer ought to be compelled to satisfy himself that his product is a standard one. And that will be the result if it is made a crime to sell worthless serums. But if we permit a manufacturer to sell any product he can by hook or crook get released from his factory by a Federal inspector we will place a premium upon dishonesty, or at least encourage the sale of a low-standard product.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman think that a serum, passed by the Government and pronounced to be potent, should constitute a liability on the part of the person who sells it because some other scientist convinces the court that it is not potent?

Mr. MOSS. It is a sufficient reply to say that a serum which will not protect a man's hogs ought not to be sold, and it ought not to be possible to sell it legally under the law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can you get any better authority than the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. MOSS. Yes; hold the manufacturer to his proper responsibility, and then superimpose the supervision of the Department of Agriculture. This double protection is superior to either one alone. We are in the first stages of regulation. In 1913 it was supposed that the question of regulation was going to assure to the farmers of the United States that they could depend upon the serum that came from licensed manufacturers. It has been proven that they can not depend upon it. The manufacturer has not hesitated to cheat and defraud the purchaser by selling impotent serums.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. In a moment. The theory proposed is that we shall depend upon regulation alone rather than the responsibility that ought to rest upon every manufacturer in addition to regulation. I want them both held responsible—the manufacturer and the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. REAVIS. Under the terms of this bill the Government makes the test of the serum and certifies both as to its potency and the lack of contamination, does it not?

Mr. MOSS. It is given the power to make the test.

Mr. REAVIS. The duty is imposed upon the Government to do it, is it not?

Mr. MOSS. I would assume so; but that does not relieve the manufacturer of his responsibility—to sell the quality of serum which he advertises for sale. No manufacturer could sell worthless serums if he advertised them as such.

Mr. REAVIS. If you are going to prosecute a dealer for selling in interstate commerce this product which the Government has certified to be pure, are you not going to make him liable upon the prosecution of the United States for a mistake which the United States itself made?

Mr. MOSS. The theory of the gentleman will not hold, because if the Government of the United States has inspected it, and the serum itself is potent, the man can not be prosecuted, because it will comply with the law and with his proper obligation to his customer. But if the serum is impotent or the virus is impure, the manufacturer has no right to sell it even if it has been inspected and passed by the Government. The condition we wish to destroy is where impure virus and impotent serums are being sold to farmers for use in their herds. I do not care whether the fault lies with the United States Department of Agriculture in its inspection, or whether it lies in the manufacturer. If, as a matter of fact, worthless, impure serum is sold, the damage to the purchaser is just the same, and I do not care to make it possible for them to be sold and no man held responsible for it. That is the objection that I have to this amendment.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, if this bill contained no provision requiring the Government to inspect and certify as to the purity and potency of the serum, the position taken by the chairman of the subcommittee and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] would be entirely justified, but the burden of determining the lack of contamination or potency of the serum is placed upon the Government itself. Notwithstanding the fact that the Government certifies the purity and potency of the serum, in the absence of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, the dealer is to be prosecuted by the United States and severely punished because of a mistake which the United States itself committed. If this bill carried a provision that the serum should be inspected by the dealer before entering it for shipment in interstate commerce, I could readily understand why he should be subjected to prosecution for shipping either impotent or contaminated serum, but when not only the authority but the duty is imposed upon the Government of inspecting the serum, of certifying as to its potency, and the dealer is lulled into the security by the certificate which the Government itself issues, then, because the Government itself makes a mistake in its examination, you by this measure visit the evil of that mistake upon the man who is nowise responsible. The Government becomes a plaintiff in a criminal prosecution against an innocent party because of a mistake which the Government itself has made. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the words "United States," insert the words "or imported therein."

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman who has this bill in charge to this fact which is the basis for this amendment. In line 16 the language is that the law shall apply to any serums, and so forth, manufactured within the United States. Now, if that shall be all, then all that will be necessary for any manufacturer of an impure or infected virus, if this bill passes, will be to move his establishment over to Mexico or the Canadian border and engage in the traffic there and ship the infected virus all over the United States.

Mr. RUBEY. We have a provision in this bill that applies to importations. We have a provision providing for the inspection of viruses and serums imported.

Mr. TOWNER. If that be the case that makes it doubly necessary to put that language in.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not see any particular objection to it.

Mr. LEVER. I call the gentleman's attention to line 10, page 4, section 5, prohibiting imports into the United States without a permit from the Secretary of Agriculture. I think that covers the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. RUBEY. I did not understand the gentleman's amendment as at first reported. It would be impossible for us to go into a foreign country and inspect and license a manufactury in that country.

Mr. TOWNER. Even there you say it shall not be imported without a permit from the Secretary of Agriculture, and this is a provision by which somebody will make an investigation and examination.

Mr. RUBEY. I will say to the gentleman that there is very little importation of serums and practically no importation of hog cholera serum at all.

Mr. TOWNER. There might be a good deal if this bill passes. I will say to the gentleman, however, I do not desire to insist upon that if the gentleman thinks that point has been entirely covered.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not think it will be practical for the Department of Agriculture to go into the inspection of factories in foreign countries. That could not be done.

Mr. SLOAN. Let me suggest that this serum is patented in Canada and other foreign countries.

Mr. RUBEY. All serum imported now under the provisions of this act are inspected and come in under a permit.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Section 5 provides for the inspection of the imported serum.

Mr. RUBEY. It does. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, after the word "been" insert "examined by and approved, or."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is simply introduced for this reason: The language of the section is that viruses must be prepared under and in compliance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Now, if you prepare it under regulations and in compliance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, that would imply that the Secretary of Agriculture should have knowledge of the serum before it was prepared. It seems to me that it would be better and make the bill more efficacious if you should have it in the alternative; that is, that the examination might be made or that it might be prepared under the direction. I submit that for the consideration of the gentlemen having in charge the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to cause to be inspected and tested, under regulations prescribed by him, all such viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, prepared or intended for sale, barter, exchange, or shipment as aforesaid by any establishment licensed under this act. If, as a result of such examination, inspection, or test, it shall appear that such virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product is worthless, contaminated, dangerous, or harmful, the same shall be destroyed by the owner or manufacturer thereof, or by any other person, firm, or corporation in possession of the same, in accordance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. It is hereby made unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell, barter, exchange, or ship or deliver for shipment as aforesaid, or, otherwise than in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, to remove from any establishment licensed under this act any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product for use in the treatment of domestic animals which has not been examined, inspected, tested, and passed in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 15, after the word "animals" insert the words, "and for transportation in interstate commerce."

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, I think we will all agree that we have no authority to interfere with intrastate manufacture or sale, and while it is true any court in reading this bill might come to a fair conclusion as to what was intended by the man who drafted it or by the men who enacted it into law, yet it seems to me that by the insertion of these words it would remove the necessity for any such interpretation and make the meaning absolutely fair, and I therefore hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to the amendment. I think possibly it might be better put in this way. In line 14, after the word "remove" insert the words "for interstate shipment" from any establishment, and so forth. Would not that meet the gentleman's viewpoint and put it in a better place in the bill?

Mr. HELGESEN. All right, I will accept that.

Mr. RUBEY. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment I will offer it.

Mr. HELGESEN. I will accept that as a part of my amendment. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment in order to accept the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HELGESEN. I move to insert, after the word "remove," in line 14, the words "for interstate shipment."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 14, after the word "remove," insert the words "for interstate shipment."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That no license shall be issued under the authority of this act to any establishment where viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products are prepared for sale, barter, exchange, or shipment as aforesaid, except upon the conditions that the licensee will conduct the establishment and will permit the inspection of such establishment and of such products and their preparation, and the examination and testing of the same, and will furnish all necessary animals, materials, and facilities for making such inspections, examinations, and tests, in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: On page 4, at the end of line 5, strike out the period and insert the words "and will keep such records as may be required by him."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, section 14 of this act authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture, by regulation, to prescribe the records to be kept and reports to be made by establishments licensed under the act. I suppose that authority is sufficient, but it seemed to me that it might be desirable to make the keeping of these records one of the conditions prescribed in section 4. And I therefore submit the amendment for what it may be worth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That no carrier, or other person, firm, or corporation, shall transport or receive for transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to or through any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to or through any foreign country, any virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product for use in the treatment of domestic animals, unless and until the shipper or his agent shall make and deliver to such carrier, or other person, firm, or corporation, a written certificate, in form prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, signed by the shipper thereof or the agent of such shipper, stating that the same has been prepared under and in compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture at an establishment holding an unsuspended and unrevoked license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture under this act, or has been imported into the United States by an importer holding an unsuspended and unrevoked permit issued by the Secretary of Agriculture under this act, and stating the kind and amount of the product transported or offered for transportation, the license number of the establishment which prepared the same or the permit number of the importer who imported the same, that it is not at the time of shipment or delivery for shipment worthless, contaminated, dangerous, or harmful, and such other facts as the Secretary of Agriculture may require by regulations made pursuant to this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section, and I sincerely hope the gentleman will not ask to have the section remain in the bill. What is the situation? These viruses and serums are handled largely through drug stores, I take it. Is not that the case, may I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss], if he knows?

Mr. MOSS. I think, Mr. Chairman, that up to the present time they are sold almost entirely direct from the manufacturer to the consumer.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know that farmers in the part of the country with which I am familiar have been able to go to the drug store and get some of these viruses—the hog-cholera virus, and so forth. Now, there is no requirement in the bill that they shall be labeled. Here is a country drug store in a district where there is a threatened outbreak of cholera, or possibly an outbreak somewhere near there, and it is foolish to suppose that each one of the farmers would order a package of the virus from the manufacturer. The country drug store makes an order for drugs and not merely for viruses. They will be handled through the big drug-store manufacturing concerns, who are the manufacturers in the main. They are not labeled. When they are shipped they are not called viruses or serums, but called drugs.

Mr. RUBEY. Section 9, on page 7, says that containers of viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products, and so forth, shall bear the name of the product.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. That is the container; that is the package the farmer receives.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman used the word "container."

Mr. MANN. I do not think I did. I said the package was not labeled, and it is not. The inside container is labeled, and properly, but when it is wrapped up the box is not labeled and the paper is not labeled. At least, there is no requirement that it be labeled; and it is shipped to the drug store and goes under the classification of drugs in the broad schedule, and it is called drugs. The railroad company does not know what it is. Even if it is shipped alone the railroad company will not know what it is. It may be 1 package in 50 small drug packages. The railroad company has no knowledge of it. And yet gentlemen propose to put a knowledge on the railroad company, regardless of their knowledge, because the court has held that over these matters where we have the plenary power the man that does the act does it at his own risk, whether or not he knows anything about it. And, of course, if you said the railroad company had to know in order to be guilty, the provision would amount to nothing, because the railroad company would never know that a serum was contained in an article called drugs.

Now, there is no provision requiring the package to be labeled. We have a provision in reference to the transportation of explosives. There we required a package to be labeled. Now, it is sufficient to put the penalty against the shipper who violates the law by shipping. And it seems to me, with all due deference to the proposition in the bill, it is ridiculous to attempt to impose the penalty upon the carrier who does not and can not know what he is carrying, unless he is told by the shipper. Besides that, there is no occasion for this provision. It puts a burden upon everybody connected with the trade to have to file a certificate. Giving the license number and all information concerning it every time a shipment is made is unnecessary. You forbid any shipment, except it is made in a licensed establishment. That will prevent shipments in interstate trade of everything else except by people who want to defraud. They are reached otherwise. We have never carried in any of these bills relating to interstate commerce, for the purpose of controlling shipments from one State to another, penalties against a carrier who can not know what he is carrying, but we have directed the penalty against the consignor, who knows what he is shipping, or the consignee, who knows what he is receiving. They are the ones to be penalized.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman if this would not act as a preventive to the shipment of toxins through the United States mails, and hence make the carriers liable for the act?

Mr. MANN. It would make the Postmaster General and probably everybody else connected with the matter liable, because they could not comply with this provision. I do not know, but that might help some.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will not be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. You had best get a quorum here, then.

Mr. RUBEY. Section 5 provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall make the regulation and that no carrier shall receive this for shipment without a certificate. It is a requirement that is not drastic. The shipper goes to the railroad company. He has his package, he has his certificate, possibly pasted on the package. He delivers it to the carrier, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. HELGESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. HELGESEN. If this section is to be retained, do you think it would be a wise thing to so amend it as to have viruses packed or boxed by themselves and so marked that the carrier could know what he was receiving?

Mr. RUBEY. I do not think there will be any question but that the Secretary of Agriculture, in the regulation he is authorized to make under this provision, will prescribe those regulations which will meet the gentleman's suggestions.

Mr. HELGESEN. That might be true.

Mr. RUBEY. And I want to say this: The drug stores of the country do not, as a rule, handle this serum.

Mr. HELGESEN. They have handled it.

Mr. RUBEY. There is very little of it handled through the drug stores. Practically all of the serum that is handled is handled through veterinarians, and they get their serums direct from the manufacturers.

Mr. HELGESEN. Well, they have not so received them heretofore, and there is no impossibility of joining with that package other packages.

Mr. RUBEY. But that would be an exception to the general rule.

Mr. HELGESEN. I know; but you must provide for exceptions to the general rule.

Mr. RUBEY. There is no question but that the packages of virus and serum will be marked, and this particular product will be wrapped separately and shipped as a separate package.

Mr. HELGESEN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are many post offices located near the line between one State and another, and if a farmer in the country lives near the dividing line the rural carrier delivering that package would not know sometimes what he is carrying, and the package ought to be so plainly labeled that the rural carrier will know what he is carrying.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. Did I understand him to say that the druggists do not handle it?

Mr. RUBEY. They do handle some of it, but comparatively little.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the gentleman know that in his country and in mine it is handled almost exclusively by druggists, and that they keep special refrigerators for the purpose of retaining the potency of the serum?

Mr. RUBEY. That is not my information as it comes to me from the department.

Mr. REAVIS. And is it sold in a container, usually of a pint in capacity?

Mr. RUBEY. I understand so.

Mr. REAVIS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there is nothing in this bill that requires the contents of the package to be certified or denoted in some way on the outside of the package?

Mr. RUBEY. There is such a provision in section 9.

Mr. REAVIS. That is the container of the serum itself. But is there anything in the bill requiring that the statement of contents shall be placed on the outside of the package containing it if the serum or virus is packed along with other medicines in a common package?

Mr. RUBEY. That would come up under the regulations of the Department of Agriculture in regard to shipment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out section 6.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 6 is stricken out. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That containers of viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals which are sold, bartered, exchanged, shipped, or delivered for shipment as aforesaid shall bear the name of the product, and such devices, marks, or labels for the identification and indication of potency of the same as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, in form and manner as required by the regulations made pursuant to this act, and shall not bear, contain, or be accompanied by any statement, design, or representation which is false or misleading in any particular.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 7, line 17, after the word "products," insert the words "its date of manufacture."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as to putting on the date of manufacture, as a matter of convenience are these viruses and serums manufactured from day to day?

Mr. RUBEY. Well, I judge they are manufactured in larger quantities than that would indicate. A certain amount of virus is manufactured at a time, and the date of manufacture will probably be every few weeks, possibly not every day, but every few days, or every week or two. I do not know as to that. I am just giving the gentleman my own idea, because I understand it is manufactured in large quantities, and the date on that quantity would be the same date, of course.

Mr. MANN. I take it that under the amendment the day of the month will have to be put on the label. Of course, that means it will have to be written on, not printed. You could not have a new label printed each day.

Mr. RUBEY. They manufacture about 80,000 cubic centimeters in each batch. How long that would last I do not know.

Mr. MANN. I did not know but that it would be practicable to put on the month of manufacture without undertaking to require that you must use a different kind of label or write the day different for each day of its manufacture. The labels in this case are manufactured by the millions and they are put on the packages by machinery. It becomes a very complicated proposition if any of the large drug manufacturing establishments is to be required to put on the label by hand and write the label by hand.

Mr. RUBEY. My understanding is that if they were to put on it the month it would be sufficiently accurate. I think that is a very wise suggestion that the gentleman makes. This is a committee amendment and I offered it here on the part of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I should think the Secretary of Agriculture would have authority under the regulations to require this.

Mr. RUBEY. I suppose so.

Mr. MANN. If we are to put this into the law, so far as I know, by using the word "date" you would have to put the day and the month.

Mr. STAFFORD. Usually when the dates are stamped on these labels they are either perforated or stamped with a rubber stamp. Nearly all the establishments have a rubber stamp for the day on which the business is current.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not think there would be any objection to putting on the label the month of manufacture.

Mr. LEVER. Would that be satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RUBEY. The month of manufacture?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. We want to put on the label the approximate date of manufacture so that anyone who buys it will have some notice of its age.

Mr. HELGESEN. The approximate date of manufacture is a mighty important thing, because if it gets into the trade—and it is handled by the drug trade—it may be potent when the druggist receives it, and he may hold it for five or six years, when it will be no good. I think both the month and the year ought to be included.

Mr. MANN. Of course it ought to cover the month and the year. I think the month carries with it the year.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the first amendment and offer the following.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee amendment is disagreed to.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] offers a new amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. RUBEY. Insert in line 17, page 7, after the word "products," a comma and the words "the month and year of manufacture."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 7, line 17, by inserting, after the word "products," "the month and year of manufacture."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDERSON: On page 7, at the end of line 23, add the following:

"The Secretary of Agriculture shall also cause to be affixed to said containers a device, mark, label, or certificate indicating that the contents thereof have been inspected and passed by him before the same are removed from the place where prepared."

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems to me the purpose of this amendment ought to appeal to the committee——

Mr. RUBEY. I will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That any person, firm, or corporation, or any agent or employee thereof, who shall pay or offer, directly or indirectly, to any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture, or of the United States, authorized to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act, or by the regulations made hereunder, any money or thing of value, with intent to influence such officer or employee in the discharge of any duty herein provided for, or which may be provided for by the regulations prescribed hereunder, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or by both; and any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture, or of the United States, authorized to perform any of the duties prescribed by this act or the regulations made hereunder, who shall accept any money, gift, or thing of value from any person, firm, or corporation, or any officer, employee, or agent thereof, given with the intent to influence his official action, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be summarily discharged from his office or employment and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or by both.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KING: Amend section 13, in line 21, page 9, by adding after the words "official action," the following, to wit: "or shall own, either directly or indirectly, any stock or financial interest in any establishment or establishments sought to be licensed and regulated by this act."

Mr. KING. I understand the committee make no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make and promulgate, from time to time, such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, including regulations to prevent the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, shipment, transportation, importation, or exportation, in violation of this act, of any worthless, contaminated, dangerous, or harmful virus, serum, toxin, or analogous product for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and regulations prescribing the records to be kept and reports to be made by establishments licensed under this act and by importers holding permits issued under this act. All such regulations shall have the force of law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words in lines 11 and 12, page 10, "All such regulations shall have the force of law."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "All such regulations shall have the force of law."

Mr. RUBEY. I accept the amendment. I think it is a very good one.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This paragraph and others in the bill relate to the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture over imports and exports. That may trench somewhat upon the authority of another committee, and it may also interfere to a certain extent with what are known as Treasury regulations. May I ask whether the committee has considered this phase of the question, and whether it is complying with precedents in giving authority over imports and exports to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. RUBEY. The Committee on Agriculture have taken jurisdiction of these matters in the past. It is a question of jurisdiction. When a bill is referred to a committee that committee has jurisdiction over it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To what extent are these serums and antitoxins imported?

Mr. RUBEY. A very small quantity of serums are imported.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So far as imported serums, and so forth, are concerned, what are they used for in this country?

Mr. RUBEY. They import some serums for particular diseases of animals, such as, possibly, the blackleg, the serum for lockjaw, and things of that sort.

Mr. KING. Hydrophobia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the event of some unusual discovery, or some scientific development on the other side, there might be any reason for admitting foreign serums, I was wondering whether——

Mr. RUBEY. They will be admitted, under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Have they any advantage over us now in foreign countries in this matter?

Mr. RUBEY. I do not think so. Only a very limited amount of serum is imported into this country. Practically all the serum used in this country is manufactured here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman familiar with the tariff on these manufactured serums?

Mr. RUBEY. I have not looked up that matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it customary to give the Secretary of any department except the Treasury Department jurisdiction over exports and imports? The Secretary of the Treasury has charge of the customhouses.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit my butting in, I think everything of this sort in recent years has probably followed the provisions of the pure-food law, which I drafted. In working out the subject with the Department of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury, or the officials in the Treasury Department who deal with the customs, under that law, under the pure-seed law, and under the law now in force on this subject, whenever anything of the sort is imported it is shown in the manifest. The customs officials turn over a specimen to the officials of the Department of Agriculture. Pending examination the shipments are held in warehouses or elsewhere, and when the Department of Agriculture certifies to the quality and purity of the articles, which certificates give them admission, they are admitted. If there are customs dues to be paid, they are paid. If the Secretary of Agriculture declares that they are impure, or that under the law, so far as he is concerned, they are of such quality that they are not subject to be imported, they are returned to the importer and required to be destroyed or sent abroad, unless the articles are such as can be cleaned or brought up to standard quality in this country. So these regulations have been worked out with the Treasury Department, and I may say to the gentleman that when the pure-food bill came up I consulted with the very distinguished gentlemen then constituting the Ways and Means Committee, whose antagonistic efforts I did not court, and having consulted with them, they did not oppose what we put in the pure-food law, it having met their approval in advance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume if there was a duty on any of these imports the Secretary of the Treasury would collect them. Of course that would not be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary of Agriculture has no control over the importations except to examine them and report upon the quality of the articles.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois, who is the author of the pure-food law, a very excellent law and which is constantly quoted and doing great service throughout the country, whether in his bill appears language such as appears on line 6, section 5?—

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue permits for the importation into the United States of viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products, for use in the treatment of domestic animals, which are not worthless, contaminated, dangerous, or harmful.

That would appear to be an invitation on the part of the Government, through the Secretary of Agriculture, for people to hunt these things up and bring them into the United States.

Mr. MANN. Of course there is no such provision in the pure-food law. This contemplates that there may be an inspector for the Government of the United States in Canada or in Mexico, and it might be an inspection of some new virus, perhaps some new virus in European countries. That is evidently what it contemplates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It reads as if the Secretary was to invite people to make these importations. I am satisfied with the statement that has been made by the gentleman on the question, but I want in my time to further inquire whether the committee insists on retaining the language found on page 7, line 3:

Pending investigation, a license or permit may be suspended temporarily by the Secretary of Agriculture, without affording the permittee or licensee an opportunity for a hearing.

I intended to raise this question when the paragraph was read, but I was called to the telephone at the time.

Mr. RUBEY. I want to say to the gentleman that it may become necessary to act under that provision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a very unusual provision, to take away one's rights without giving him an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. RUBEY. It is only on extreme occasions when that provision will be taken advantage of, but it may be very desirable and necessary to do it. When we passed the grain-standard act we gave the Secretary of Agriculture authority to appoint grain inspectors, and we gave him the authority also to discharge them on certain conditions, and to do so without a hearing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman this—I know the gentleman is trying to do the right thing, whether we agree on his bill or not? Suppose a large establishment manufacturing virus, and so forth, with large overhead charges and many men employed, should be complained against by some individual a thousand miles off, who insisted that the particular virus he had received from this manufacturer was impure, and a hostile Secretary of Agriculture should suddenly and without notice and without an opportunity for hearing recall that license and thus throw the establishment out of business. Does not the gentleman think that is giving the Secretary a great deal of latitude?

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is stating an extreme case. I do not think any Secretary of Agriculture would do a thing of that kind on the statement of a man a thousand miles away. I know that the Secretary of Agriculture could be depended upon to do the right thing. He is not going to suspend a license upon somebody's mere statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I might have the same feeling, but the gentleman is an experienced legislator, and I question whether he wants to give arbitrary power to a Secretary to deprive a man of the right of hearing.

Mr. LEVER. There might be this situation. An establishment might find itself with a lot of contaminated stuff on its hands and desire surreptitiously to get rid of it. If the Secretary of Agriculture should find it out, he could suspend the license; but it is an extreme case. I think the Secretary ought to have the power temporarily to suspend the license.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In that event the man should be arrested at once, and then he could have a hearing.

Mr. LEVER. We provide that the license shall not be taken away until after a hearing except in this extreme case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there any other act that the gentleman can mention where a license may be taken away from a man without giving him a hearing?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; in the grain-standard act.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of getting as much light as possible, I want to state an incident where this section would be of very great benefit. In 1915 in a certain location in my district the foot-and-mouth disease broke out again. It was suspected that the serum manufactured by the Chicago Serum Co. contained the foot-and-mouth germs. It was not known, and it became necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and to suspend the further sale of the serum until the investigation was made. Now these serum manufactories are not large institutions, as some gentlemen think. They are small, and a good many are located in the stockyards district in the city of Chicago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose it should happen in a case of that kind that it was not the serum of the Chicago company, but some substitute serum, would it not be unfortunate to have the Secretary of Agriculture stop the Chicago company by suspending the license?

Mr. KING. But would it not be better to stop the company than it would to spread the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the man complained against should be made to explain. May I ask the gentleman if they use a serum in the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. KING. Oh, no; I did not so state.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that he has probably had no personal familiarity with hog-serum business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have heard a great deal about it since I came to Congress.

Mr. BORLAND. His knowledge is theoretical and the objection that he raises is theoretical. There is no practical difficulty that will occur under the provision that the committee has put in the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] has stated a case which would be proper for the exercise of this power in the Secretary of Agriculture to suspend the issuance of a license or to revoke a license where a contagious disease is epidemic and is prevalent, and it may become material to immediately stop the shipment of the serum. That has occurred in every big stock center in the country in recent years. It is a measure of safety not only to the agricultural interests, but to all men engaged in the serum business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not the Secretary of Agriculture have the power to do that thing in the way of stopping shipments? My point is you are stopping the business at the source by revoking the license; you are putting him to the tremendous inconvenience and expense without a chance to be heard as to whether he is responsible or not. I approve that the Secretary should have the right to stop shipments if bad serum is going to any locality; the shipments should be stopped immediately. I contend the Secretary has that power now, but to say that the Secretary shall immediately upon notice of this kind withdraw a man's permit, and thus close his establishment, would be working an unnecessary and a dangerous hardship.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the practical method of getting at it, and I want to say to the gentleman that it does not destroy his stock on hand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It costs the man a good deal if he employs a hundred hands, more or less, to shut down——

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will listen to me and quit theorizing, I will explain that there is nothing to it. It is being done right along, and has been done ever since the serum business was put under the Government control. The serum is kept at a certain temperature in vaults under the earth. It does not deteriorate, but the order stops the man from shipping a serum into interstate commerce until the question of the danger is determined. The loss to him in the temporary stoppage of a shipment is so much smaller than the possible risk to others by his shipping the serum that there is no question at all in the choice. The Government must make the choice of either permitting him, pending the hearing, to continue what might be widespread danger or of stopping him temporarily. Speaking about a hostile Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Agriculture would never be in a position where he would want to stop the supply of serum that was going to the farmers unless there was absolute necessity for it. It would not be a question of arbitrary action on his part, but it would be a question of the protection of the agricultural interests.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman is right as to the Secretary of Agriculture. I have no criticism to make as to any individual, but I will ask the gentleman now whether revocation of the permit, as is proposed here, without hearing, would not completely stop the entire business of the permittee?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but that has occurred before.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not go far beyond the purpose the gentleman has in mind, which is the stopping of a shipment?

Mr. BORLAND. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may cause much trouble and loss.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is not correct about that. I have had before the Department of Agriculture a half dozen or more cases in my own State where permits had been withdrawn from companies manufacturing serum, and some of them proved to be cases where the permits could be safely issued, and after a hearing were safely issued; but pending the investigation of the matter the safety lies in the withdrawal of the permit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That so much of this act as authorizes the making of regulations by the Secretary of Agriculture shall be effective immediately; all other parts of this act shall become and be effective on and after January 1, 1917.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "January," in line 16, page 10, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "July."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 16, strike out the word "January" and insert the word "July."

The Chairman. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this bill if it becomes a law at all at this session will probably not receive the approval of the President prior to the 4th of March. Of course, most of these provisions are now the law.

Mr. RUBEY. A great many of them.

Mr. MANN. Will there be sufficient time between March 4 and July 1 in which to comply with the provisions of the law?

Mr. RUBEY. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Of course the Secretary will have to make regulations. My observation has been, where, before an act can go into effect, regulations have to be made by the department, that it generally takes several months to do it. They can not make regulations without giving notice—that is, they will not, and having hearings—and after they have had hearings they very often make some foolish provisions because of lack of knowledge. If the gentleman is satisfied that four months' time is sufficient, I have nothing against it.

Mr. RUBEY. The department itself thinks that they can get everything ready by the 1st of July and put the act into effect without any trouble at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That so much of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914," approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats. L., pp 832, 833), as relates to the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, shipment, or importation of viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals is hereby repealed, effective on and after the 1st day of January, 1917.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 11, line 3, by striking out "January" and inserting "July."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 3, strike out the word "January" and insert the word "July."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all moneys appropriated for carrying out the provisions of so much of said act approved March 4, 1913, as relates to the preparation, sale, barter, exchange, shipment, or importation of viruses, serums, toxins, or analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, which shall remain unexpended on the 1st day of January, 1917, are hereby made available for carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 11, line 10, by striking out the word "January" and inserting the word "July."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 10, strike out the word "January" and insert the word "July."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman from Missouri indicate how much money there is unexpended under the act of March 4, 1913, that will be available for the purposes of this act?

Mr. RUBEY. There will not be any unexpended by the 1st of July, but the new appropriation for 1918 will be available on July 1.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the gentleman's estimate of the amount that will then be available?

Mr. RUBEY. There is nothing asked for in this bill. The Agricultural appropriation carries an item of $172,240 for carrying into effect the act of 1913, and that amount is made available for this act if it should be passed and become a law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman say how many new employees will be employed to carry this into effect?

Mr. RUBEY. They have in the neighborhood of 60 inspectors now, and this act will probably require 15 or 20 more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What will be the entire cost of the operation of the act? Has that been estimated?

Mr. RUBEY. There will be no additional sum needed to that carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill—$172,240.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How will these employees be employed?

Mr. RUBEY. They will be appointed, as they are now, under civil-service regulations, by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no special provision in this bill that they shall come in under the civil-service law?

Mr. RUBEY. They are now appointed under the civil service, and the additional ones will be appointed in the same manner.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of Agriculture stated in his letter that it would cost several hundred thousand dollars to establish test stations for serum if the Government were to undertake to do this test work on its own account. Has that been taken into account in the estimate for carrying out this bill?

Mr. RUBEY. That is one reason why this plan has been selected. Another is that the department has discovered a method by which they are able to get rid of any contamination from any disease contained in the serum. By applying the heat tests to it they can kill the germs of the foot-and-mouth disease or any other disease contained in the serum without in any way affecting the serum itself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Government itself is not actually going into the manufacture of viruses and serums?

Mr. RUBEY. It is not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not going into the business of establishing such stations?

Mr. RUBEY. It is not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it is applying a new force to the investigation of serum and virus factories by sending its agents and inspectors into those factories for the purpose of making tests?

Mr. RUBEY. These tests will be made at the expense of the factory itself under the supervision of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And this plan is cheaper for the Government?

Mr. RUBEY. Very much cheaper.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether there has been a virus found that will control or cure or prevent the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. RUBEY. No; I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A good deal has been said about the use of virus for that purpose.

[Mr. SLOAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15914) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUBEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. STEELE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 190. Joint resolution to continue and extend the time for making report of the joint subcommittee appointed under a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," approved July 20, 1916, and providing for the filling of vacancies in said subcommittee; and

S. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress.

COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AD INTERIM.

The SPEAKER. The law requires the Speaker to appoint a temporary Committee on Accounts that will take charge of accounts after the Congress will have adjourned, and there are so many things in the rush of the last day or two of a session that it is likely to be forgotten. Therefore the Chair names the following committee now, to serve until the next Congress meets and to begin its duties on the 4th day of March next: Mr. PARK, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and Mr. SANFORD.

VETERINARY INSPECTORS AND LAY INSPECTORS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] to call up a bill by the direction of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture I call up the bill H. R. 16060.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16060) providing for the classification of salaries of veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors (grades 1 and 2) employed in the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16060, with Mr. ALLEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16060, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16060) providing for the classification of salaries of veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors (grades 1 and 2) employed in the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I think the bill ought to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after July 1, 1916, the Secretary of Agriculture shall classify the salaries of veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors (grades 1 and 2) as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the entrance salary of all veterinary inspectors within the classified service and actually employed as such in the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture shall be $1,400 per annum; those of said veterinary inspectors who on and after the date of July 1, 1916, may be receiving a salary less than $2,400 per annum shall thereafter from said date receive an annual increase of $100 until their minimum salaries shall amount to $2,400 per annum; all other promotions or increases in salaries shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. That the entrance salary of all lay inspectors (grade 2) within the classified service and actually employed as such in the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture shall be $1,000 per annum; those of said lay inspectors (grade 2) who, on and after the date of July 1, 1916, may be receiving a salary less than $1,800 per annum, shall thereafter from said date receive an annual increase of $100 until their minimum salaries shall amount to $1,800 per annum; all other promotions or increases in salaries shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 4. That the entrance salary of all lay inspectors (grade 1) within the classified service and actually employed as such in the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture shall be $840 per annum; those of said lay inspectors (grade 1) who on and after the date of July 1, 1916, may be receiving a salary less than $1,600 per annum shall thereafter from said date receive an annual increase of $100 until their salaries shall amount to $1,540 per annum, and after an additional year's satisfactory service their minimum salaries shall be increased to $1,600 per annum; all other promotions or increases in salaries shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 5. That no promotion shall be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding year.

SEC. 6. That there shall be appropriated annually in the Agricultural appropriation bill such additional sums to the $3,000,000 annual appropriation, provided for in the act approved June 30, 1906, found in the Thirty-fourth Federal Statutes, page 674, as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal any part of the meat-inspection law contained in the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 674), entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907," and in the act of March 4, 1907 (34 Stat. L., p. 1260), entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the chief purpose of the bill is to standardize the salaries of the veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors, grades 1 and 2, by providing a new form of compensation and a definite scale of promotion.

The Civil Service Commission and the Department of Agriculture announced to all who proposed to enter into this newly created branch of the service as veterinary inspectors with the entrance salary of $1,400, that promotion to $1,600 would be made after two years' satisfactory service, with promotion to $1,800 after satisfactory service for two years at $1,600 per annum. The above schedule was announced by the United States Civil Service Commission in several publications.

The first announcement of the salary schedule for inspector's assistants (now included in the group of employees designated as lay inspectors, grade 1) was contained in the notice issued by the Civil Service Commission for examination to be held on September 5, 1907 (Notice Form No. 1248), which stated the entrance salary as $840 per annum, promotion to $1,000 per annum to be made after three years' satisfactory service at $840, promotion to $1,200 to be made after three years' satisfactory service at $1,000.

The committee recognizes that the announcements of the Civil Service Commission are not binding on Congress, and these announcements are cited here only for the purpose of setting forth the circumstances.

The following public announcements regarding this matter were made by Dr. A. D. Melvin, Chief of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry:

[Service Announcements, No. 26, June 15, 1909, p. 50.]

PROMOTIONS DELAYED FOR LACK OF FUNDS.

On account of a considerable increase in the cost of inspection, due to the constantly increasing number of establishments under Federal inspection without a corresponding increase in the funds appropriated for carrying on the work, the bureau now finds it impossible to adhere to the schedule of promotions which have in the past been announced in connection with the positions of veterinary inspector, stock examiner, and inspector's assistant. As a result a number of employees have unfortunately failed to receive the promotions which they expected and which the bureau fully intended to make as planned. Nevertheless the bureau wishes to assure all faithful employees that their work is appreciated and that their cases will be considered just as rapidly as possible.

In view of this notice inquiries on this subject from bureau employees are being filed without reply.

Two similar announcements were later made.

At this point I desire to state briefly what each section of the bill provides for and is intended for. Section 1 prescribes the short title of the act. Section 2 specifies the salary schedule for veterinary inspectors as follows: The entrance salary shall be $1,400 per annum, and there will be promotions of $100 per annum until the salary of $2,400 per annum is attained.

The Civil Service Manual for the spring of 1916 contains the following statement on this question regarding the requirement and qualifications of these inspectors:

The applicant must show that he has graduated from a veterinary college of recognized standing or that he is a senior student in such an institution and expects to graduate within six months from the date of the examination.

The Civil Service Commission also announces the age limit as from 21 to 41 years. Beginning in the year 1917, the Civil Service Commission will require that all applicants for the position of veterinary inspector must be graduates of a school with a course of four years, leading to a degree in veterinary medicine. In view of this fact, it is evident that the Bureau of Animal Industry will find it difficult to attract capable veterinarians to the service in the absence of an equitable salary schedule being established.

The new Army bill gives to the Army veterinarians rank and commissions up to major with pay and allowance of such office. The maximum pay of a major is $4,000 per annum. Hence the Army veterinarians will be advanced to $4,000, with quarters, fuel, and light free. It would appear that the salary provided for in this bill for veterinarians—$2,400—is reasonable, especially so since the veterinarians provided for in this bill do not have quarters, fuel, and light furnished free, as do the Army veterinarians.

Now, section 3 provides that the salary schedule for lay inspectors, grade 2, shall be as follows: Entrance salary, $1,000 per annum, with promotions of $100 per annum until a salary of $1,800 is attained. These of grade 2 are simply those lay inspectors who have been advanced by promotion from grade 1. Originally they were denominated differently. Grade 1 includes all skilled laborers who under the law formerly were called "taggers"; also inspectors' assistants, from $840 per annum to $1,100 per annum. All meat inspectors at $1,000, $1,100, $1,200, $1,320, $1,380, and $1,400 are designated as lay inspectors. They are of grade 2. Vessel inspectors at $1,200 to $1,600 per annum are designated as lay inspectors, and they are designated as of grade 2. All stock examiners, at $1,000, $1,100, $1,140, and $1,200 are now designated as lay inspectors of grade 2. All field stock examiners at $1,200 were designated as lay inspectors of grade 2. All meat inspectors at $1,500 were designated as lay inspectors of grade 2. That shows the dividing line between grade 1 and grade 2, as practiced now in the Department of Agriculture in the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, would it disturb the gentleman's statement to ask him a question at this point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should prefer not to yield until I have finished this statement.

As I said, section 3 provides a salary schedule for lay inspectors, grade 2, as follows: Entrance salary, $1,000 per annum, and promotions of $100 per annum until a salary of $1,800 is attained. Those who entered this grade through examinations for the position of meat inspector held from March 6, 1908, to March 3, 1913, were required to have not less than five years' experience in curing, packing, or canning meats, and by reason of their experience in the canning room, dry-salt or sweet-pickle cellars, sausage, lard, oleo, butterine, or beef-extract departments, were competent to inspect meats and meat food products as to their soundness, healthfulness, and fitness for food. Grade 2 includes meat inspectors, stock examiners, field stock examiners, and vessel inspectors, and so forth, as I have previously stated, within the salary limit stated by me.

Section 4 of the bill specifies a salary schedule as follows for lay inspectors, grade 1: Entrance salary, $840 per annum; promotions of $100 per annum until a salary of $1,540 is attained, with promotion to $1,600 after an additional year's satisfactory service.

Now, the duties of this position are to assist both veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors of grade 2 at slaughterhouses and packing establishments in connection with their duties as inspectors of meat and meat-food products. Appointment in grade 2 positions will be made by promotion from grade 1. At least three years' experience in handling live meat-producing animals is a prerequisite for consideration for this position. Experience in handling meat alone will not be considered sufficient. Applicants must have reached their twentieth but not their thirty-fifth birthday on the date of the examination by the Civil Service Commission.

Section 5 provides that promotion shall be upon record of efficiency and faithfulness.

Section 6 provides that, in addition to the permanent annual appropriation of $3,000,000, there shall be appropriated annually sufficient sums to carry this bill into effect. It is estimated that the additional appropriation for the first year would be $309,420.

The author of this bill, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK], is ill at a hospital recovering from a surgical operation, and I am not authorized to speak for him, but I feel safe in saying that he will favor an amendment to the bill providing that the recent 5 per cent and 10 per cent increase in salary and wages granted to the Department of Agriculture employees in the Agriculture appropriation bill passed last Monday shall not apply to veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors under this bill where this bill increases the 5 per cent or 10 per cent, as the case may be.

It is not possible to secure, so we are informed by the Bureau of Animal Industry, an estimate as to how much the additional amount for increased salary as provided by this bill will be in the years after the first year, because they say they have no way of telling how many there will be who will be entitled to advancement, or who will be advanced or promoted. The figures are based on the number of employees in the service June 1, 1916, that will be affected by the bill.

Mr. Chairman, will the Chair notify me when I have consumed 15 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. This only takes care of the inspectors in the Bureau of Animal Industry?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes; veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors.

Mr. COX. They are meat inspectors at the various slaughterhouses in the United States?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They have a variety of work to perform.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. They include the live-stock inspectors, do they not?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes. Among the duties to which the employees provided for in this bill may be assigned are the following: Meat inspection; tuberculin testing of cattle; control and eradication of hog cholera; eradication of dourine; interstate inspection of cattle and horses; eradication of glanders, sheep scab, cattle scab, horse mange, and Texas-fever ticks; handling of southern cattle outside of quarantine area; execution and administration of the 28-hour law; eradication of foot-and-mouth disease; inspection relative to existence of contagious diseases; supervision of import and export animals (quarantine of import animals and tuberculin testing of export animals); scientific investigations of animal diseases; control of importations and manufacture of viruses and serums, toxins, and other analogous products.

Mr. COX. Is it the same class of men who were accused of letting the foot-and-mouth disease get away from them about two years ago?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think some such charge was made that some inspector did not properly diagnose the disease.

Mr. COX. Which section of the bill applies to that class of inspectors that did let the foot-and-mouth disease get beyond their control?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Section 2.

Mr. COX. That is the high-priced fellows, the $2,400 men; that is the class of men that was accused of letting the foot-and-mouth disease get beyond their control?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have heard it said that one individual let it get beyond his control; he was probably included in this class.

Mr. SABATH. There would be more efficiency, would there not, if this bill went into effect?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It should tend to more efficiency.

Mr. COX. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the closing language in sections 2, 3, and 4—

> All other promotions or increases in salaries shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

That is very plain and very satisfactory to me, but in that connection I want to call attention to section 5, where it says—

> That no promotion shall be made except upon evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture of the efficiency and faithfulness of the employee during the preceding year.

Now, the language used in sections 2, 3, and 4 gives the Secretary of Agriculture discretionary power to increase salaries of all other employees, and section 5 requires him to be supplied with evidence before he can increase any salary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Secretary of Agriculture would make a promotion if the evidence satisfied him however he might obtain it.

Mr. COX. Yes; then what is the necessity of carrying section 5 in the bill if you prohibit him from using discretion except upon evidence?

Mr. BORLAND. The reason is to prevent the promotions becoming automatic without regard to the record of the man who is performing the labor. Section 3 provides for annual promotions.

Mr. COX. Sections 2, 3, and 4 provide for automatic increases, but section 5 gives the power to the Secretary of Agriculture to increase only upon evidence.

Mr. BORLAND. The automatic salaries are in figures.

Mr. COX. Yes; fixed by figures; but the power it gives to the Secretary of Agriculture to increase salaries is not fixed in figures.

Mr. BORLAND. No. Sections 2, 3, and 4 fix the maximum salaries at $1,600, $1,800, and $2,400. Above that the Secretary of Agriculture can make promotions in accordance with provisions in section 5.

Mr. COX. I want to get the gentleman's interpretation of section 5, which is to this effect: That the Secretary of Agriculture would still have the power to present the automatic promotions even though sections 2, 3, and 4 were enacted into law.

Mr. BORLAND. I think that was brought out at the hearings.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the gentleman from Missouri has correctly interpreted the language.

Mr. COX. If these promotions are automatic, can the Secretary of Agriculture prevent it except by discharging the employee?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He can, if the record is not efficient.

Mr. COX. It will finally depend on what view the Secretary of Agriculture may take of it?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I do not think it gives the Secretary an arbitrary power.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I do not quite understand this provision along the line of what the gentleman from Indiana has been inquiring about. Section 4 has this language:

All other proportions or increases in salaries shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

It is first provided for the increase which it would appear was automatic, and that all other promotions shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary. Now, section 5 provides that no appointment shall be made except on evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture. Does not there appear a conflict between those two provisions?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has explained that. The gentleman will notice that the language of the bill is that the employee shall receive an annual increase of $100 until the salary shall amount to $2,400 per annum. Now, when they attempt to advance above the salary of $2,400 it can only be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Do I understand that the language at the close of section 4 only applies to increases in excess of the maximum amount in the preceding sections?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The way the bill reads their minimum salary shall eventually amount to $2,400.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. This speaks of lay inspectors of class 1 and 2. What is the distinction between the two classes?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I gave the duties of these two grades of inspectors a moment ago. No. 2 grade is a sort of graduation from No. 1.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Do the three classes here mentioned include all of the inspectors and examiners employed in the Union Stock Yards in Chicago?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is my understanding.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Those who attend the scales and inspect the live stock as well as the meat inspectors?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That includes everything.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. And they are all entitled to an increase under the operation of this bill if they are entitled on their merit to such increase in the discretion of the Secretary?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is right. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain to the House briefly the present status of this meat-inspection service. Back in 1906 a great excitement broke out in this country about the wholesomeness of meat and the sanitary slaughtering of animals. It resulted in the passage through this House of the first post-mortem meat-inspection bill. Prior to that time we had had an ante-mortem inspection of cattle, an inspection on the hoof. That still continues, with some enlargement. This provided for an inspection of the carcass in the establishments from which the meat or its products were to be shipped in interstate commerce. A permanent annual appropriation of $3,000,000 accompanied that law, which still exists, but the service has grown beyond the $3,000,000 annual appropriation and now there is a $300,000 appropriation added in the Agricultural appropriation bill. Of course, when the service first began it was wholly experimental. Nobody knew exactly what inspection was needed or what force was needed or what classification of employees, or even what their qualifications ought to be. But now the service is no longer experimental. It has become a fixed part of the Government service, so fixed that I take it that nobody would favor or even suggest the repeal of the meat-inspection law. Every family in the United States now relies with certainty upon the rigid enforcement of that law, and the food products branded, inspected, and passed by the United States inspection service are found in every grocery store and market in the land. It includes the packed products as well as the fresh products.

There are, roughly speaking, two classes in this service. The veterinarians, who are scientific experts, graduates of veterinary schools, and the meat inspectors, who are the graduates of the school of experience, who are experienced meat inspectors. There are two classes of them. This bill further classifies the lay inspectors into grades 1 and 2. Grade 1 is what we used to call taggers. They are the skilled laboring men who are qualifying themselves by experience to be promoted to grade 2. Grade 2 may have been promoted from grade 1, but not necessarily so, because grade 2 was frequently made up of men who have been foremen for many years of large departments in the packing houses. The service gets the experienced men if possible.

The time has come when in justice to the service and in justice to the men and for the efficient carrying on of the business it is necessary they should be classified and a maximum and a minimum salary provided for them, a species of promotion for long service and good record. That is the primary purpose of this bill. This work, while it is centralized probably into some 40 or 50 or 75 packing centers in the country—it is not centered in a half dozen but something less than a hundred—involves 90 per cent, I will undertake to say, of the packed products and possibly 65 to 75 per cent of the fresh products of meat on the American table. It is almost universal in its operation, even though it is local in its work. The slaughtering is done in the great packing houses, beginning at an early hour after midnight, when there is a heavy run of stock, sometimes as early as 2 o'clock in the morning. The meat inspector must be on hand, because the minute the animal is slaughtered in the pit and the chain is put around his leg and he is hoisted to the conveying attachment, the meat inspector is there to inspect the animal. He takes out the viscera, begins to inspect them, the heart, the lungs, the liver, and so on, and he must do that rapidly and accurately. Very little leeway or indulgence is granted him in making a mistake. If he passes an infected part and some other man catches it and a report is made, after three such reports have been made the man is discharged. It is the most rigid, I think, of all the service of the United States in discharging men upon three complaints for inefficiency or lack of attention to their duties. As I say, these men work in the cold and wet, in the packing houses, and they work long hours, sometimes 4 or 5 hours on a stretch and sometimes 10 or 11.

The carcass passes from that across the table where every portion must be inspected. If there is a doubtful case it must go to a place at the upper end of the packing house where the chief inspectors, with an expert inspector in charge, are and is passed on as an appeal case. If the carcass is condemned it goes into a vat where a fluid is put in rendering it unwholesome for food and it is reduced to fertilizer or soap grease later. It is absolutely destroyed. A man who is inspector on the job can not leave until the steam is turned over and every condemned carcass is destroyed and made impossible for use for human food, so that his hours are sometimes long, dependent upon the run of stock. That is the class of work to be done. The scientific work of the veterinarians embraces not only live-stock inspection, spoken of here this afternoon, in the prevention of epidemics, but the inspection of carcasses, all parts, as they go through the operations of the packing house. Then comes the meat inspector who inspects the curing of hams and sides of bacon. These men can take a side of bacon out of the brine by sticking a knife or fork or pronged instrument into it and they can draw it across their noses and tell you whether that bacon is going to cure within a certain number of hours and be cured in a wholesome way so as to be preserved. They are experts. They inspect sausage, various canned products, corned beef, and so on. They can tell whether that has been properly cured and their judgment will be demonstrated. Gentlemen, if you take any canned goods and put it away for 2 weeks or 30 days you will find the can they condemned will spoil and the can they told you was good will not spoil. So their judgment is always subject to the practical test of accuracy. I just wanted to give an idea of the work that is being done by these men to show whether these salaries which are no higher in range than the ordinary clerical salary in the District of Columbia, are clear out of proportion on account of the work these men are performing. In my judgment they are not. In my judgment they are quite moderate and will not attract more than the necessary ability that the American people can rely on for this very important service. We could not very well pay less for such a class of men provided in this bill. We tried to fix the lowest price to get the right kind of men, not to pay the highest price for their services.

Mr. SABATH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact 638 men resigned from their positions on account of the hardships they were obliged to endure and the exacting conditions demanded of them, over 20 per cent, last year, and is it not very hard for the department to secure efficient men for this service?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is right about it. The veterinary inspector who is able to do this work is such a clear-headed, quick-witted, and skilled man that he can frequently obtain work elsewhere, especially in these times, and a man who is able to do this meat inspecting is able to secure a position as foreman or a department head, especially in the large packing houses, and they frequently go away from our service to establishments elsewhere. That has frequently been the case.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman give us some information as to the duties of the inspection of the animals on foot?

Mr. BORLAND. As to the inspector of the animals on foot, when the live stock comes in and are driven into the pen the inspector inspects them for signs of lumpy jaw, tuberculosis, and scabies. If it is the case of a hog he picks out the hog that has a high temperature, which is liable to have hog cholera, and segregates it, and then he passes on the other stock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire two minutes; I want to close this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. He segregates them to see that he does not do any injustice to any man. After it has been examined and condemned it goes to the packing house, and if after post-mortem examination it appears to be diseased in any particular and unfit for human food the owner is paid on the basis of soap grease. If it proves good for human food, then he is paid on the basis of such.

Mr. KING. The gentleman has mentioned a number of diseases. What does he do when making an inspection for foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. BORLAND. I could not tell you how they arrive at the inspection for foot-and-mouth disease. They usually quarantine a suspected case and watch it. I do not think they can classify or diagnose a case of foot-and-mouth disease by an instant inspection like they can lumpy jaw and some of these other common diseases. But I know about hog cholera. They can tell in 24 hours, because the temperature of the hog may be due to the fact that he is excited from his shipment over the country, and his temperature may be high because of that, and if you give him a chance to cool and rest, his temperature may drop to normal. Then he has not the hog cholera.

Mr. KING. Can you not tell it by the "smacking" of the animal?

Mr. BORLAND. I think so. The foot-and-mouth disease is not so prevalent that we are familiar with it there in the stockyards. Where a case occurs they instantly bring the experts to examine it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, it shall not be my purpose to detain the committee the full hour in opposition to this bill. In my opinion, the bill has not a single leg on which to stand. It is wholly and totally void of all merit, if not of all decency, for many reasons, a few of which I shall endeavor to call to the attention of this committee.

The bill is entitled "Providing for the classification of salaries of veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors (grades 1 and 2) employed in the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture." In the very first place the bill is erroneously entitled. It should be entitled by its true and proper name, and that is "A raid upon the Treasury of the United States, backed by and supported by a salary grab to the extent of $309,000." That should be the title to this bill, because that is all there is in it, and that is all that is intended to be in it. There is no intention in this bill whatever to better the service. There is no intention in this bill to make the inspection more rigid and severe in their inspections. There is no intention in this bill whatever to detect frauds about to be perpetrated upon the people of the United States merely by and through an increase of salary of these employees.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. You speak of the increase of the salaries to the extent of $309,000. That is for the first year.

Mr. COX. That is true.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The gentleman loses sight of the fact that the increases go from year to year to the extent of $100 a year.

Mr. COX. That is true. I want to compliment the committee on reporting this bill out for getting away from the ground on which increase of salaries heretofore has been bottomed. Since Congress met we have been continually besieged to increase salaries because of the enormous increase in the cost of living, as urged by those favoring wholesale increase of salaries. That is the ground upon which all these increases have been sought which have gone on the various appropriation bills. I sincerely desire to compliment the committee in reporting this bill in getting away from that threadbare, worn-out argument. This committee seeks to justify the report on this bill not upon the increased cost of living, but because they say that this class of employee was misled by some kind or some sort of a statement given out by the Civil Service Commission some five or six years ago.

If the Civil Service Commission made any mistake or erroneously let a report go out which misled this class of employees, why, of course, Congress is not bound by that, and the committee concedes that Congress is not bound by such a statement made by the Civil Service Commission. But that is the ground, and it is the sole and only ground, on which this increase of salaries is sought to be bottomed, namely, because the Civil Service Commission made some sort or some kind of a promise some five or six years ago that if men would enter this kind and character of service they would start at a salary of $1,400 a year, with an increase of $100 per year thereafter until their minimum salary reached $2,400.

I want to call this committee's attention to the fact that this week, when the Agricultural appropriation bill passed this House, it increased the salary of these men from 5 to 10 per cent. I want to call this committee's attention to the fact—and if I am wrong I ask to be corrected by some member of the Agricultural Committee, who knows whether I am right or wrong about it—I want to call this committee's attention to the fact that within the last three or four years Congress increased the salary of this same class of men by increasing the appropriation, as I recall now, $250,000. Now, here is that increase of salary three or four years ago. I do not know just what it amounted to when it was spread out over the salaries of these men.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I will.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I simply wish to inform the gentleman that those increases did not go in this increase of salary. The money was spent for other purposes.

Mr. COX. I recall distinctly that I reserved a point of order upon the increase of salaries, and my good and genial friend, for whom I have the profoundest respect, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] begged me out of it, and I finally let it go in. When that amount was spread out to all of these employees, I do not know how much it increased their salaries; but this much I do know, and this much every member of this committee knows, that this week we put a provision upon the Agricultural appropriation bill increasing their salaries from 5 to 10 per cent, which means an additional increase of salaries of $900,000 per year, if it becomes a law, and I hope before it becomes a law that some way, somewhere, it will be defeated and this amount saved to the taxpayers of the Nation.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Is not this a fact, that the increases heretofore have been extended to only the veterinarians and that the grades 1 and 2 of lay inspectors had not received any increase, and that amongst the lay inspectors are men, from practical experience, the most efficient in the service?

Mr. COX. I do not know about that; but if that be true, the inspectors are getting a lion's share of this proposed increase in this bill, because they are the ones who get an annual increase of $100 per year from $1,400 per year until they reach a maximum salary of $2,400.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman suggests that a provision for raising these salaries already had gone into another bill for an increase of 5 to 10 per cent.

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that at the time this bill was reported there was no provision for an increase in the salaries of these men, but the bill that passed through the House this week does provide an increase of 5 to 10 per cent. I gather from the gentleman's argument that he thinks that that is a sufficient raise and that this is not necessary?

Mr. COX. I opposed the other increase as well as this. I think that neither of them should have been passed. I quite agree with the gentleman that when this bill was reported on the 8th day of June last the increase of 5 to 10 per cent we passed here the other day had not become a law; this high cost of living cry had not been invoked so strongly as it now is. I am not sure but if my genial friend from Kansas had to write this report again, he would bottom it upon the old stock argument of the increased cost of living. But at the time he prepared this report that argument was not as strong, as forceful, or as powerful as it is to-day.

Now, this bill takes care of 1,250 veterinary inspectors, 1,100 lay inspectors of grade 2, and 800 lay inspectors of grade 1, a total of 3,150 inspectors. Let me call the attention of this committee to a fact, and I ask you to seriously consider it, and that is this: If you pass this law, you are going to practically disorganize the entire force of the Department of Agriculture. Why? Because you are providing by this bill for the automatic promotion of these 3,100 men. You are making of these 3,100 men a favored class, the only class in all the fifteen or twenty thousand employees in the Department of Agriculture that will be given the right to an automatic increase in their salaries. And just as certain as you pass this bill, just so certain the day will come when you will have to classify all the other employees of these various bureaus down there, and automatically promote them and increase their salaries. If you are ready to pay the bill, all right. I am not.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield for a question.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and he knows that that is the rule in the Post Office Department.

Mr. COX. That was put in long before I came here. I never would have stood for it if I had been here.

Mr. BORLAND. The work requires experience. Experience is needed for a man to do that work in the Post Office Department.

Mr. COX. Oh, Mr. Chairman, it does not require much experience for a man simply to carry mail on his back in the various cities. That rule of promotion is wrong and never can be defended upon any ground whatever.

This bill has been floating around here for a number of years. I do not know just how long it has been around here. I recall that six years ago, I think it was, I was made chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and for the life of me I am trying to find out how it got out of my committee. But it never got out of my committee when I was chairman of it. I was besieged practically from every source and corner of the United States to report this bill, but it never got out of there. And I have been besieged, as I am sure every other Member has been, from the four corners of the United States to support this bill, but I am not going to do it. Men in my own district, scores of men in my own State, have written me to support this bill. Our great State of Indiana last winter had the nerve and the temerity to ask me to support it. Well, we paid the penalty of it in Indiana in the last campaign for the increase of State salaries during the eight years we were in control there, and I am not going to pay the penalty any more if I can avoid it.

Now consider this section 2, gentlemen of the committee. That does not even provide for a maximum salary. This bill is cunningly prepared. A skillful draftsman wrote it, a man who knew what he was saying to catch Congress, like the man's coon dog—coming and going. They incorporate in it only the minimum salary. That is to be $2,400 a year for an inspector, and they incorporate in it another provision which will give to the Secretary of Agriculture power to increase the salary of inspectors beyond $2,400 a year, if the interpretation of sections 2, 3, and 4, as interpreted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is correct, and I presume it is. Why was this language incorporated in this bill, "That all promotions or increases in salaries shall be made at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture"? They are automatically increased to $2,400 a year. That, then, becomes the minimum salary, and from that time on the Secretary of Agriculture is given the discretion, upon evidence presented to him, to increase the salary beyond $2,400 per year.

My Democratic friends, are you willing to pay the penalty? Are you willing to go upon record, in view of the fact of our platform at Baltimore in 1912, criticizing our Republican friends for the creation of new offices and the increase of salaries, and so forth? If you are, you are going to get a chance for a direct yea-and-nay vote on it. You can vote it. I refuse to do it.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield for a question.

Mr. WM. ELZA WILLIAMS. I want to hear the gentleman's view as to what effect both of these bills will have, the 5 to 10 per cent increase and this bill; whether they will conflict, or whether both increases will be allowed and accumulate?

Mr. COX. I think it would be a cumulative increase. I do not think there will be any question about the increases being cumulative. The 5 to 10 per cent will be added to the salaries of these employees, and if that does not bring them up to sections 2, 3, and 4 in this bill, then, of course, they will go on to the salaries fixed in these three sections.

Section 3 undertakes to take care of the lay inspectors of grade 2. It starts these gentlemen upon a salary of $1,000 per annum, increasing at the rate of $100 per year until a maximum salary is reached at $1,800. What is the reason for it? Has any friend of this bill yet got upon the floor and undertaken to explain to the committee that the increase of salary to the men occupying that grade would give any better service? Oh, no. Has any friend of this bill undertaken to say that if section 3 is agreed to, that meat would be any purer, that it would be any better inspected than it is? Oh, no. My friend from Missouri laments about the hardship that these employees undergo, the long length of hours they are required to work, the dangerous work in which they are engaged, and things like that. My friend from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] laments seriously, because, as he says, 638 of them resigned some time ago. If the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] is correct—and I listened attentively to him last year—he successfully established the fact, from which there has been no appeal, that these inspectors in the city of Chicago were directly responsible for letting the foot-and-mouth disease get from under their control. I do not recall that any man at that time or since has taken the floor of the House and undertaken to defend them against that charge. If that charge is true, then, although there have 638 resigned, not enough of them have resigned yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if 638 did resign, their places were immediately filled, and 30 or 40 more appointed.

Mr. COX. That is correct; there is no question about that.

Mr. RAINEY. The report that they make shows it.

Mr. COX. There is no trouble and no difficulty in filling these places at the salaries they are now drawing. I undertake to say that if you consult the civil-service eligible list, you will find 100 on the waiting list anxious and ready to take these positions at the present salaries.

Mr. SABATH. There is only this difference: That those that resigned are experienced men, and those who have been appointed are new men who do not know the business as did those who resigned.

Mr. COX. Yes; I had some experience in that myself in my own district last year. A man with 12 years' experience resigned; he let his year go by with the civil service, but he finally came to the conclusion that he had been getting better wages in this line of work than he could get in any private employment. I went from the Civil Service Commission to the Agricultural Department, and even to the President of the United States, trying to get him to issue an Executive order turning him back into the service. I could not do it, because they had already filled his place.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that there has never been a period of time when the laboring man since 1800 has made an effort for reduced hours of labor or increased pay, but that the argument is made that there are always men ready to take their places?

Mr. COX. I can not yield for a speech. As to what effect an automatic promotion is going to have in the Agricultural Department, what are you going to do with the Forestry Bureau? Why do not you automatically increase their salaries? I undertake to say that scores of men are working in much more dangerous places than are these inspectors mentioned here. I undertake to say that the records will show that by far a larger number of men working in the Forestry Bureau have lost their lives than have lost their lives working in this line. Why do you not automatically promote their salaries? Take the Bureau of Markets, a great department doing a splendid work. As I recall now, we gave it something like a $500,000 appropriation. Why do not you provide for automatic increases of their salaries? Oh, you say, one reason why they ought to have the increase is because of the necessary transfer from one section of the country to another, and that their employment is such as to make it uncertain how long they will be occupied in the new assignment. How about the forestry employees? They are transferred all over the West from one place to another, and they can not tell from one day to another where they are going to be the next. How about the employees in the Bureau of Markets?

They can not tell from one day to the next where they are to be transferred. And how about the employees in the Bureau of Soils? They can not tell from one day to the next where they are going to be detailed for work. So, when you follow this argument that because of the uncertainty and tenure of their domicile their salaries ought to be increased—when you follow it to the last analysis—it has not a leg on which to stand. There is no merit in it. Now, the fathers of this bill I do not think are very numerous even on the Agriculture Committee. That is my candid judgment about it. They say they ought to have this increase because the new Army bill gives to the Army veterinarians rank and commission up to major, with pay and allowances of such office. The report goes on to say:

> The maximum pay of a major is $4,000 per annum; hence the Army veterinarian will be advanced to $4,000 per annum, with quarters, fuel, and light free. It would appear that the salary provided for in this bill for bureau veterinarians is reasonable, especially so since the veterinarians provided for in this bill do not have quarters, fuel, and light furnished free.

Because the veterinarian in the Army gets $4,000 a year, and because he gets fuel and light free—in my opinion too much, but that is the law—they say here that the veterinary inspector in the meat department ought to have $2,400 also. There is a loophole and a provision in the bill whereby, if they can bring the proper pressure to bear upon the Secretary of Agriculture later on, they may be able to go to $4,000 per year. Mr. Chairman, as I said, I do not want to appear to be too vehement against this bill, but I am constitutionally opposed to it. I am going to ask my Democratic friends whether or not they can vote for this bill, which will deliberately reach into the Treasury of the United States and take out of it $309,000 the first year? As my friend from Texas said, no one has undertaken to say what it is going to cost from that time on, and the committee was very modest in undertaking to explain away that point.

The committee says that it is impossible to secure an accurate estimate as to what it would cost for the second, third, and fourth years. I quite agree with them that it is impossible, and yet it does seem to me that the Agricultural Department, provided with all of its experts, with all of its men who know how to follow this legislation out to its last analysis, ought to be able to say to the committee how much it will cost the second year. It is believed that the additional appropriation annually would be approximately $300,000, they say. They say that these figures are based on the number of employees in the service on June 1, 1916, to be affected by this bill.

To repeat, no friend of this bill has undertaken to say, and I undertake to say no one will undertake to say later on, how much this bill is going to cost the second year, how much it will cost the third year or the fourth year; but we do know that the veterinary inspector's salary is increased from $1,400 to $2,400 per year at the rate of $100 per year, and that when they reach the salary of $2,400 per year they then have reached only the minimum salary. This much we do know, that the bill provides that the lay inspectors of grade 2 shall start at $1,000 per year, and that they shall be increased $100 per year until their minimum salary is reached, amounting to $1,800 per year. We do know that the lay inspectors of grade 1 start at a salary of $840 per year and increase at the rate of $100 per year until the minimum salary reaches $1,540 per year, and then the lay inspectors of grade 1 have been exceptionally cared for. They want to give them just a little bonus, and they have crowded an extra hundred dollars in if they are extra good men, because section 4 provides that after an additional year's satisfactory service the minimum salary shall be increased to $1,600 per annum. That is lay inspector No. 1. If he is a good boy down there and is obedient and stands in and has the right kind of a pull, he has a chance to get an additional $100 over and above his $1,540 per year. Where is this increase in salary going to stop?

I have observed floating around through the newspapers the last three weeks different proposals as to where we are going to get the money to pay these enormous appropriations. I have observed in the press that some men high in the councils of our party were possibly figuring on putting a duty on coffee, tea, and wool and things like that; but so sure as the night follows the day there will be absolutely no escape if we go on making these increased appropriations, increasing these salaries, from the fact that we will have to tax tea and wool and coffee or something else, because there is no escape from it, or be put in the ridiculous attitude, in the pitiable aspect, in time of peace with all the world, of the Government being compelled to issue bonds or certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. Chairman, all through my life economy has been a revenue producer. If I had not practiced economy I would have been in the poorhouse a long time ago, because I never was able to earn very much money. Every time I found that I was not earning enough to live on I began to cast about with a view of seeing whether or not I could not economize somewhere. I think that is a pretty safe principle for a legislative body, charged with the responsibility of collecting and disbursing the revenues of the Government, to act upon. You undertake to save a million dollars and you are met with the argument that it is bound to be expended and that the Government will be ruined if it is cut off. You undertake to save $100,000 and you are met with the argument again that it is too small to fool with and that there is no use in paying attention to it. I have heard men privately say, Members of the House, that because we are called upon to spend tremendous sums for the Army and the Navy they are in favor of letting the boys out in the country get some of the money; that they are perfectly willing, if we vote these appalling sums for the Army and Navy, to increase the salaries of the Government employees, so that they may get something out of it.

That argument is unsound; it has no basis on which to stand at all. If the increase in the Army and Navy is wrong, let us stand up and vote against it. If it is right, let us stand up and vote for it; but let us not undertake to justify our votes upon these increases of salaries, forsooth, because everything is going to the Army and Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have detained this committee longer than I anticipated. This bill ought not to pass. It has no merit in it. It can not be defended upon any ground whatever, except the bare ground that it is a salary grab pure and simple. When any Members of the House want to vote for this legislation, let them do it with their eyes wide open that it is a salary grab, because no Member of the House has yet and no member of the committee has yet undertaken to show where, if the bill becomes a law, any better service will be given to the people as a result of it. If you want to vote it as a voluntary gift out of the Treasury of the United States, do it; but do it on that ground, because that is the only ground on which it can be maintained. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, this bill can be defended on the ground that its beneficiaries are not properly paid servants of the Government. As one Democrat to whom my good friend from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has appealed, I am not the least bit afraid of the future either as to myself individually or to my party. I believe that the Democratic Party not only wants a living wage for men in the Government service but it also wants men in the Government service to be properly compensated for their services. Now, I know nothing about the situation in Chicago when certain employees of this bureau were alleged to have been either incompetent or negligent when the foot-and-mouth disease broke loose in that city. Some one man, or some two or three men, may have been lax in their inspection, but for myself I am unwilling to smirch an entire service because of a laxity of one or two individuals. Let me briefly tell this committee how much work these men have done in a single year—the last year. Mr. Chairman, the American Journal of Veterinary Medicine, in its last issue, states that the United States Meat-Inspection Service certified to the wholesomeness of 11,220,948,000 pounds of meat from 61,826,324 animals during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916. During that period this bureau condemned 380,945 animals and 738,361 parts of animals, equivalent, sir, to about 84,320,000 pounds of meat. Now, in my judgment, these figures show at a glance the far reaching and vast importance of this branch of the Federal service in conserving the health of the people of this country. I know that the department of animal industry in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is on record as stating that it is dependent at all times on the cooperation and assistance of the veterinary inspectors in the service of the United States Department of Agriculture in the control and eradication of contagious diseases among animals, as was testified when we had in our State not so long ago an outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease. And I want personally to take this opportunity to compliment the employees of the Federal Government on the wonderful work they did in Massachusetts in stamping out that dread disease.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reorganization of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry in 1906 fixed the present salary rate in the bureau and had but small consideration for its phenomenal growth and the extension of its activities, and, despite what my good friend from Indiana has stated, so far as I have been able to find out no change has been made in the salary scale since it was originally adopted. Let me say to the gentleman that the Lobeck bill in its purpose does not intend to place in easy circumstances the men who come within its provisions in view of the high cost of living, but it is intended to pay these men only what they deserve and to remedy something wrong which has existed too long.

With a 10-year-old salary basis, such as obtains to-day, you will readily realize that men performing such tasks and under such conditions as do the employees of this bureau certainly deserve a better rate of compensation. Other men, with less preparation and ability, in other walks of life, with nowhere near similar responsibility, generally receive compensation far in excess of the maximum salaries paid to these inspectors. For instance, the wages of the men employees of the various packing houses have been increased from 30 to 50 per cent for a nine-hour day, with extra compensation for overtime; yet the Government inspectors in the same establishments actively engaged in the most arduous and revolting kind of work very often work 12 hours per day without extra remuneration. This applies also to holidays and Sundays, and, in my judgment, some relief from the present condition of affairs is absolutely imperative. Salary promotions to these men have been few and irregular, and resignations of experienced men who enter other employment at a higher compensation have been many and are increasing.

To my own knowledge the men of the Boston branch have been working long hours in the packing houses in order that the tax-paying public may have its wholesome meats. I believe that the vast importance of this inspection service in conserving the health of our people is hardly realized.

Mr. Chairman, the Paymaster General of the United States Navy is on record as stating that the work of these men has been consistently excellent and that through their efforts the quality of foods delivered to the Navy has been materially improved, resulting not only in the Government getting better value for its money but in the men getting better food. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that it is universally conceded among those who ought to know that the spirit of avarice existing at all times is held in check by these inspectors, and unscrupulous contractors are prevented from foisting deteriorated food products on the personnel of our Army and Navy.

I can not conceive that the beneficiaries of this proposed legislation are about to wallow in wealth if granted these increases. In my judgment, they will still be compelled to curtail their living expenses, even if this bill should pass. I ask the Democrats in this House to stand up for these faithful, hard-working, long-suffering employees of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. How much time is there remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has 25 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] has 21 minutes remaining.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to use much time in discussing this measure, but I rise to oppose it. It seems to me to be quite clear that it ought not to pass at this time. I have no disposition to take anything at all from the praise which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] has bestowed upon these employees of the Federal Government. I desire to say that they are rendering a very efficient and very useful service. But during this week in the agricultural appropriation bill, this House granted all of them who receive a salary of less than $1,200 a year an increase of 10 per cent, and all of them who receive over that up to $1,800 per year we granted an increase of 5 per cent. And here to-day we are presented with a measure that would give the veterinary inspectors an automatic increase in addition to this increase put on the Agricultural appropriation bill of $100 per year up to that point where they would be receiving $2,400 per year. And it seems to me that the Federal Treasury and the revenues in prospect for the next fiscal year are not in condition for such a display of generosity as that. I think that the membership of this House, both Democrats and Republicans, ought to show some tendency toward economy, and I do not think that a bill of this kind, taking into consideration the increases that have already been granted in the Agricultural appropriation bill, ought to be adopted by this House. As a Member of this body I have no criticism to direct at the employees of the Federal Government. I dare say that they, as a general rule, render efficient service and for the most part are earning the salaries which they receive. But I do sincerely believe that they are receiving on an average fully as much as the same grade of employment is receiving in others walks and avocations in this country. Yes, I will go further than that and will make bold to say that the statistics will show that in many cases they fare much better than the same class of employment in private life.

We are continually hearing the expression "Back to the farm." We are continually confronted with the question, "Why is it that our bright young men leave the farm and go to the towns and cities and enter industrial pursuits and mercantile pursuits and professional callings instead of agricultural vocations?" I noticed in a paper one day this week, under the head of "Things that we dislike to know," this little statement, that "the lure of the city to the farm boy is greater than the lure of the farm to the city boy." That is unmistakably true, and one reason for it is because the salaries and the remuneration in the mercantile pursuits, in the clerical pursuits, in the industrial pursuits, and in the professions, on an average, is much better than can be obtained on the farm. There is no use to try and dodge the facts. What I have said is so. And I say that it is time we were waking up to these conditions. But I will not prolong this discussion at this time. Mr. Chairman, I will say in closing that we owe these men mentioned in this bill fair and equitable consideration, and I believe that they are now receiving it and that now would not be an appropriate time to vote any additional increase in their salaries. [Applause.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I believe we will have one more speech on this side before we finish.

Mr. COX. Then I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, for the first time I appear in opposition to a salary increase which has apparently been awarded by a committee after proper investigation. I have received, as all of you have received, so many communications from different sections of the United States calling my attention to this bill and to the necessity for its passage that I have at last become interested in it, and during the progress of the discussion this afternoon I have been making some calculations as to the effect of this measure upon the Treasury of the United States which the committee did not make.

We are advised in the reports filed here that there are 3,150 employees engaged in this particular work. They are known as lay inspectors, grade 1; lay inspectors, grade 2; and then the inspectors themselves, who belong to the highest grade. Promotions may be made, according to this scheme, from one of these grades to the other. These young men enter the various grades from our veterinary colleges, just as young men who are graduates of our medical colleges enter as internes our hospitals, and these young men who are graduates of our medical schools are willing to serve for a period of years almost for nothing in those hospitals in order to get the experience. And you are arranging in this bill for a graduated increase in salaries from year to year and for the ultimate promotion of all these 3,150 employees until every one of them is an inspector, drawing at least $2,400 a year?

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman has overlooked this fact, that the veterinary inspectors must be graduates of a veterinary college or senior students in a veterinary college. There is no provision for promotion in the general way between lay inspectors and veterinary inspectors. It is possible a lay inspector might take the necessary scientific course and qualify himself, but he could not do so otherwise.

Mr. RAINEY. And if he did he would be entitled to these promotions which are contemplated.

Mr. BORLAND. And he should be.

Mr. RAINEY. Such a thing is possible.

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly. And possibly also he could take an examination in law or in any other science.

Mr. RAINEY. It is possible for every one of them under this bill to become inspectors, every one of these 3,150, within the next 10 years.

Mr. BORLAND. I hardly think so, because he would have to outside of his work take the scientific course, which is not——

Mr. RAINEY. Which involves studies in night schools, and there are five or six thousand young men here in Washington who are doing that very thing. I would be the last man in this House to oppose in any way the advancement of any young man. Every one of them, if he remains in the service, ought to try to advance. I am examining the effect on the Treasury of this remarkable bill in order to determine whether the Government can afford to embark on the particular enterprise outlined in the bill. A very simple analysis of this measure will show it to be the most outrageous and indefensible of all these salary grabs which are pushed here with so much enthusiasm. If this bill does not pass to-day, under the rules of this House it will not be a legislative possibility to pass it at all during the present session, and I intend to see that it does not pass to-day. By the time the next Congress convenes there may be such a sentiment aroused throughout the States against these salary grabs that a repetition of the exploits of this session will be impossible. An aroused public sentiment may even defeat in the Senate at this session the salary grabs which have already passed the House. If this result is not achieved at this session, I expect to renew the fight I am now making in the next Congress, and I may then have the assistance of Members who have heard from their constituents.

Now, assuming that these 3,150 are to be promoted to the grade of inspectors—of course, if they are pushed up, others will take their places in these lower grades—but assuming that none others do, and these 3,150 reach the grade of inspector, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] admits they may, that alone would mean a charge upon the Treasury of $7,560,000.

Now, let us assume that that is impossible. The statement is made here in the report that this bill means an increase in the first year of $300,000, and no more than that. We now appropriate for this service $3,000,000. But the report is strangely silent upon what the increase will be the second year in the charge upon the Treasury, and upon what the increase will be the third year and in future years.

Now, assuming that none of these inspectors are to be promoted from one grade to the other; assuming that there will always be in this service—and it is an impossible assumption—only 3,150 men, and that 1,250 of them will be veterinary inspectors, the exact number we have now and no more, this bill, then, in this grade of inspectors alone, assuming that there will be 1,250 and no more, until the maximum salary provided here in the second section of this bill of $2,400 takes effect, that will mean at that time an increase in the charge on the Treasury for veterinary inspectors alone of $1,250,000.

That is the ultimate maximum aimed at in this bill if no more inspectors or lay inspectors of either grade are appointed.

Now, suppose the lay inspectors of grade No. 2, 1,100 of them, stay on the job, their vacancies being filled as they resign, until they get the maximum which is promised them in this bill of $1,800 per year. We will start them in at $1,000. That is $800 more a year than they are now getting. When they get their maximum under this bill, there will be an additional charge on this account alone on the Treasury of $880,000. And the same method of computation applied to the lay inspectors of grade No. 2 reaches an equally astonishing result. The increase per annum in this grade will ultimately be $688,000. In other words, instead of an increase in the charge upon the Treasury of $300,000, if we have no more inspectors than we now have—and everybody knows we will have twice as many three or four years from now—if we have no more than we now have, when these maximum rates take effect, even if the Secretary of Agriculture does not make any of the additional promotions provided for in this bill, we will have an additional charge upon the Treasury each year on this account alone, not of $300,000 per year, but of $2,818,000. To this amount must be added the $300,000 estimated increase for the first year and the $3,000,000 we now appropriate, making a grand total for this service of at least $6,118,000.

Now, that is what this ill-considered bill means. But it is insisted that these gentlemen render a valuable service, and they do; and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], for whom I have a high personal regard, and for whose judgment I also have great respect, called attention to the fact that these veterinary inspectors rendered most valuable service in his State in suppressing the foot-and-mouth disease. They rendered service in my State. A whole army of them quarantined the animal husbandry portion of that State and every county in it. They have never yet even discovered, any of them, singly or collectively, the germ of the foot-and-mouth disease. No animal has ever been cured that suffered from the foot-and-mouth disease, and no animal ever got well, because they killed every one of them.

Now, after quarantining the State of Illinois, and after these inspectors had finished their magnificent work in the State of Illinois, $4,000,000 worth of food animals had been killed and buried in quicklime. That is the remarkable work we got in Illinois from this branch of the pubic service. The State of Illinois paid half that expense, and the Federal Government was called upon to pay the other half of that enormous bill. They render a great service, a most valuable service; but the record they have made in the last two years does not entitle this branch of the Government service to the praise awarded to it so generously by my friend from Massachusetts.

Now, it is sought to sustain this bill upon the theory that the Civil Service Commission and the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, one or both of them together, made certain promises to these young men when they entered this service; that they made certain promises to them of promotions and increases of salary. Now, let us see what those promises were and what we are doing to carry them out. According to the report filed here, an implied promise was given. But I do not admit the right of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry to legislate; I do not admit the right of any bureau or commission of this Government to promise to give away the money in the Treasury. Great God! We are giving enough of it away ourselves. We do not need any help from the Civil Service Commission or Chiefs of the Bureau of Animal Industry. [Applause.] But, assuming that there is an implied promise here on the part of somebody connected with this Government to pay to these men some more money, let us see what that promise was.

Dr. Melvin states—and it is here in this report—that he promised these veterinary inspectors, if the funds appropriated for that purpose were sufficient, a maximum salary of $1,800. With that understanding he says they entered this service. He has apologized to them because he has not been able with the appropriation at his command to advance them to $1,800; at any rate, he had not so advanced them when his statement was made. But this bill not only makes good the extravagant promises of this bureau chief, but we go him $600 better. We give them in this bill, because the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry promised them $1,800, we make good on that promise and give them a maximum of $2,400. The Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry promised the lay inspectors, according to this report, in grade 2, a maximum salary of $1,200 after they had served a period of years. We give them better than that, we give them in this bill not only what he says he promised them, but $600 more, making $1,800.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. These are minimum salaries fixed in the bill.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is right. I thank the gentleman. Instead of promising them $1,800, the amount they say the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry told them they would get ultimately, we give them a minimum of $2,400 and a maximum limited only by the blue sky itself. [Laughter.] We go through all these different grades the same way, promising them not maximums, as I stated, but minimum salaries of the amounts I have mentioned. There is nothing in this bill to limit the number of those employed in this service. No wonder they have a lobby here in Washington supporting the bill and trying to get it through. There is not a thing limiting their number and there is not a single thing limiting the salaries they will ultimately get. There is enough in the report to show what they want ultimately. They want ultimately the salary of a veterinary inspector, who ranks as a major in the United States Army—$4,000. That is the star to which they hitch their wagon. That is what they are reaching for. According to the present increase in the scope of this inspection business, the number engaged in it, by the time they get the minimum salary provided in this bill and before they get the maximum, will be many times the number now employed, and they will be formidable, indeed, in their demands on the National Treasury. When that happens we may as well assemble the representatives of all these various organizations of Government employees here in the National Capital and turn the Treasury over to them.

The alarming thing about the whole situation is the increase in the number of Government employees. It may be necessary at some time—I hope it will never be necessary—to take over the railroads of the United States and make the employees of those railroads Government employees, with an opportunity to compel a timid Congress to increase their salaries. When that happens we might just as well turn the Government of the United States over to these salary grabbers who now collect in such alarming numbers around the Treasury of the United States.

There is a campaign being conducted throughout the United States to-day calling attention to "pork." "Cut it out; cut out the rivers and harbors; let our rivers and harbors fill up. Do not build public highways." We started on that project years and years ago before the days of the railroad. The great nations of the world have through all the centuries of the past been road-building nations; but in this country it is "pork." Do not build public buildings throughout this land. The great nations of antiquity built cathedrals and arches that did not pay a cent as they progressed in their careers, which have lasted for centuries. But this great Nation is to be denied that opportunity, because that is "pork." We must be satisfied here with the battleships that sail peaceful seas and rust out in 20 years of time. A ship costing $22,000,000 is ultimately and in a comparatively short time sold for old junk, and brings $2,000. That is not "pork." There is no "pork" in the amount you are paying industries that build these great ships for the Government. You do not even investigate that question.

But these other activities are "pork." When you go back home you can say to your constituents you are not to have a public building here to which you can point with some degree of pride, from which will float the Stars and Stripes, but we are going to increase the salaries of a couple of high-brow Government employees who live in this section; pin flags on them when they come home. That is the evidence of what this Government has done for you. We have increased their salary. Take that and be satisfied.

Now, I wish I could support these bills. It is easier at the present time when the public conscience seems deadened to support these bills than to oppose them. It is easier to vote for them than to have 100 men and more than that start out in your district announcing their opposition to you, because you have tried to protect all the taxpayers in your district. The real pork barrel to which I am trying to direct the attention of the country is this enormous salary grab participated in by 500,000 Government employees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana will withhold that suggestion for a moment, it is now about 6 o'clock, and I do not see much prospect of getting this bill through to-day. I think the gentleman from Kansas would better move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALLEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16060) providing for the classification of salaries of veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors (grades 1 and 2) employed in the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STAFFORD. There will be liberal debate?

Mr. MOON. Debate is unlimited now. I do not know whether the House will agree to limit debate or not. Either way is acceptable to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 11, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that amidst the pressing cares that are constantly presented to us, taking our attention and our labor, Thou dost still keep alive within us a spark of life Divine. While much of our thought is held within the boundaries of space and time, there are yet aspirations and hopes that reach out toward God, and powers within us that reason of soul, and immortality, and freedom. We bless Thee that Thou dost lead us on; that Thy Spirit still abides with us. We pray that we may measure up to God's great object and purpose in our Government and in our individual life to establish righteousness among the people. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Bryan	Clark	Fernald
Bankhead	Chamberlain	Culberson	Fletcher
Brady	Chilton	Curtis	Gallinger
Brandegee	Clapp	Dillingham	Gronna
Harding	Lodge	Robinson	Sutherland
Hitchcock	McCumber	Saulsbury	Swanson
Hollis	McLean	Shafroth	Thomas
Hughes	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Tillman
Husting	Myers	Sherman	Townsend
Johnson, Me.	Nelson	Simmons	Vardaman
Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, Ariz.	Wadsworth
Jones	Oliver	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Kenyon	Overman	Smith, Mich.	Watson
Kern	Page	Smith, S. C.	Williams
Kirby	Poindexter	Smoot	Works
Lane	Ransdell	Sterling
Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Stone

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is detained from the Senate on account of illness, and also that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on account of official business.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce, and let the announcement stand for the day, that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] owing to illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

NOMINATION OF WINTHROP M. DANIELS.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings does not state the announcement of the Senators who announced their pairs as to how they would vote if they were not paired. A number of Senators—and I was one of the number—announced how they would have voted had they been free to vote. I think the RECORD should be corrected to show those announcements.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that any correction of the publication regarding the executive session should be made in executive session.

Mr. CLAPP. I make it in open session. Others may make it in executive session if they desire.

Mr. NORRIS. It was ordered that the roll call should be published in the RECORD. If the roll call as published is not right in the announcement of the pairs, the correction, I should think, ought to be made in open session, where it was ordered that the record should be published.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to a correction of the RECORD as requested by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like not only to correct the Senator's position, but I should like to correct my own.

Mr. CLAPP. I called attention to the entire matter and asked that the RECORD be corrected to show how each one stated he would vote if not paired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks a matter of this sort should properly be discussed first in executive session. The Chair is informed that it is impossible for the clerks at the desk to take down in executive session the statements made by Senators of their position, because they are not prepared in executive session to do that.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, then I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the RECORD show that on the roll call referred to, on page 1248, proceedings of January 10, when my name was called, I announced that if at liberty to vote I would vote "nay." I make this statement because the Senate in executive session voted that the record be printed in the permanent RECORD of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair in justice to the clerks will state that the order as stated to the Chair was that the vote and the pairs be printed in the RECORD, and the RECORD seems to comply with the order.

Mr. CLAPP. I would not for a moment be understood as reflecting upon the action of the clerical force. I ask, as a matter of privilege, that the RECORD be corrected.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask that in my own case, similar to that referred to by the Senator from Minnesota, the RECORD may be corrected. I gave the reasons, and stated that if I had the opportunity I would vote "nay." I should like to have the RECORD corrected in my case. I have no doubt the clerks did all that they understood it was their duty to do at the time.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make the same correction, although I can not do it as a matter of personal privilege, because the announcement I made was for an absent Senator. I stated why he was absent, and also how he would have voted if he had been here. I was authorized to make the announcement, but, of course, I did not make it regarding myself. I have no complaint to make, so far as I am individually concerned, but I should like to correct the RECORD by adding to the RECORD the following: "That the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family, and that had he been present he would have voted 'nay.'"

Mr. BRYAN. It seems to me that the permanent RECORD ought to show that the vote on the confirmation of the nomination was placed in the RECORD by unanimous consent. The record of it now is that it was done upon motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Of course, under the rule of the Senate it could not be done except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the correction suggested by the Senator from Florida will be made in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, as the Chair will doubtless remember, I announced the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND], who was unavoidably absent. When I discovered that my colleague had voted "yea" on the previous vote I withdrew that pair, which, of course, indicated, as I stated then, that I should vote "nay" if permitted to vote. I should like to have the RECORD show that fact.

Mr. HUSTING. I was requested to announce the pair of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and I should like to have the RECORD show that I did so. I should like to have the RECORD also show that the statement was made by me yesterday that if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] were permitted to vote he would vote "yea" and the senior Senator from Wisconsin would vote "nay." In other words, the Senator from Illinois was paired in favor of the confirmation and the senior Senator from Wisconsin against the confirmation.

Mr. WALSH. I wish the RECORD likewise to show that I stated in announcing my pair that if I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 15914) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress; and Joint resolution to continue and extend the time for making report of the joint subcommittee appointed under a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee," approved July 20, 1916, and providing for the filling of vacancies in said subcommittee.

I ask that one of the telegrams be printed in the RECORD and that both telegrams be referred, I assume, to the Committee on Appropriations, although they should more properly go to the Democratic caucus.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request as to the printing of one telegram will be complied with and both telegrams will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES. I ask that one of the telegrams be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the telegram referred to will be read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

[Telegram.]

ARTHUR L'PERRIN,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegrams will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The petitions also ask for legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia; to prohibit the shipment of intoxicating liquors by interstate commerce to States having prohibitory laws; and also to prohibit the use of the mails to solicit orders for intoxicating liquors, and to close the mails to liquor advertisements. PROHIBITION IN PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 674).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask—the clerks at the desk will probably be able to inform me—whether a joint resolution from the legislative assembly of Porto Rico, with regard to the imposition of prohibition in the bill now pending in Congress has ever been received and printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts has not yet been presented.

Mr. LODGE. I present that resolution. It is a very brief one containing some important statistics. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and also that it be printed as a Senate document. It will cost only a few dollars to print it; I think not exceeding $15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution requesting the Congress of the United States not to include in legislating for Porto Rico any prohibition whatever on the sale, importation, or manufacture of alcoholic beverages in Porto Rico.

Whereas the "International Reform Bureau" has submitted a statement to the committees of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, praying the Congress to prohibit the importation, manufacture, and sale of alcoholic beverages in Porto Rico;

Whereas certain averments contrary to facts are made in the aforesaid statement, giving a false idea of our conditions and making us appear before the world as a demoralized people;

Whereas in that statement the erroneous averment is made that $14,000,000 are consumed in alcohol in Porto Rico, while only $7,000,000 are spent in wheat flour, meaning thereby that this last article constitutes the sole or largest foodstuff of our people and thus establishing a very alarming difference between the figures just quoted;

Whereas the precise amount of alcoholic liquors consumed in Porto Rico, taken from data furnished by the treasury department of the insular government, a department entrusted with keeping such statistics for the purpose of levying the excise taxes of the Government, is as follows for the fiscal year 1914–15:

Total value of article, taking as basis its annual average price:

1,926,139	liters of distilled spirits	$1,251,990.35
1,394,657	liters of beer	264,933.00
483,638	liters of wine	91,824.00
1,421	liters of champagne	5,865.00
3,805,855	liters. Total	1,614,612.35

The above statement shows there is a difference of $12,385,387.65 between the exact value of the consumption of alcoholic beverages in Porto Rico and the estimated value of $14,000,000 as stated by the "International Reform Bureau";

Whereas the total value of foodstuffs shipped into Porto Rico, according to statistical reports of the United States customhouse, for the fiscal year of 1914–15 is shown as follows:

Rice	$4,857,807
Meat and meat products	3,428,984
Fish and fish products	1,229,176
Corn meal	289,106
Beans and dried peas	712,318
Dairy products	559,379
Potatoes	184,823
Chocolate	49,243
Fruits and nuts	147,377
Onions	76,611
Refined sugar	678,814
Bread and biscuits	325,131
Canned foodstuffs	139,351
Oats	148,689
Wheat flour	1,884,416
Other foodstuffs	159,381
Total value of imported foodstuffs for consumption	14,870,606

Whereas besides the articles enumerated, there are grown on the island many starch-food plants and cereals, such as yautías (a tropical tuber), sweet potatoes, yam, plantain, yuec, potatoes, onions, breadfruit, alligator pears, corn, beans, pumpkin, and other varieties of vegetables representing an amount greater than all the rice, flour, and other similar articles shipped into the island and in milk, fowls, fish, sugar, meat products, chocolates, and other products, an amount also greater than the value of similar articles imported, and therefore the excess per capita between the food and alcoholic consumption is far greater than what the "international reform bureau" endeavors to demonstrate;

Whereas Porto Rico, compared with the United States and other countries of the world in this respect, is per capita one of the most sober and temperate countries, as can be readily seen by the following comparative statement, in which the total consumption of alcohol in Porto Rico and in the United States during fiscal year 1914–15 is taken as a basis, according to data shown on page 267 of the World Almanac for 1916:

Consumption per capita.

	Alcohol.	Wine.	Beer.
	Liters.	Liters.	Liters.
United States	5.52	1.96	77.5
Porto Rico	2	.50	1.22

Whereas the statistical reports themselves show a constant decrease in the consumption of alcohol in Porto Rico, as can be seen by the following comparative statement for the fiscal years 1912–13 and 1914–15:

	1912–13	1914–15
	Liters.	Liters.
Distilled spirits	3,391,989	1,926,139
Beer	2,433,962	1,394,457
Wine	989,067	483,638
Champagne	18,049	1,421
Total	6,838,067	3,805,655

These totals representing a reduction in the consumption of alcoholic beverages for the year 1914–15 against 1912–13 of 3,027,412 liters, an amount equivalent, approximately, to a decrease of 45 per cent in two years only, which is principally due to the influence of our educational moral and sanitation system;

Whereas a prohibition measure of that character would reduce the insular government receipts more than $1,400,000; that is, 37 per cent of the total government income, amounting only to $3,760,798.79 during the fiscal year 1914–15;

Whereas a reduction of such magnitude in the government receipts could not be compensated by any other source of revenue at the present time, taking into consideration the actual financial condition of the island. Such reduction, therefore, would involve the stoppage of our progress, for we should then have to abandon many necessary public services, such as public health, road construction, and especially our public-school work, which is indispensable to the attainment of the goal of our desires in our constant endeavor to eradicate illiteracy, furnishing a primary education to 200,000 children who are still without school facilities on the island;

Whereas it seems to be fair and in accordance with democratic principles that legislation of a local nature should be left entirely to the discretion of the local legislative assembly: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico, That the Congress of the United States be requested not to consider the aforesaid petition in legislating for Porto Rico, and that no prohibition whatever of the sale, importation, or manufacturing of alcoholic beverages in Porto Rico be included in such legislation, leaving the legislature of the island to adopt such measures as may be deemed advisable for that purpose.

Approved by the Governor of Porto Rico.

BRIDGE BILLS.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, on Monday last the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] reported three bridge bills and asked for their immediate consideration. It is always customary to immediately consider such routine bills, but at that time the controversy with regard to the volunteer officers' retirement bill was going on, which prevented those bills being then considered. It is important that the work on the bridges involved be prosecuted in order to partially relieve the railroad congestion now existing in the northern and western parts of my State, and I ask for the present consideration of the bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Chair lays the first bridge bill referred to before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 7536) authorizing the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railway Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the borough of Warren and township of Pleasant, Warren County, Pa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. 7537) authorizing the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railway Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the town of Allegany, county of Cattaraugus, N. Y., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall not object to the passage of this bill, but I shall object to any other business during the morning hour, and shall ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read three times, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

The bill (S. 7538) authorizing the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railway Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River, in Glade and Kinzua

Townships, Warren County, Pa., was announced as next in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, at the time these bridge bills were reported and objected to there was a report made on the bill (S. 7359) authorizing the Delaware Railroad Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nanticoke River at Seaford, Sussex County, Del. The consideration of that bill was first objected to and then the consideration of all the bridge bills which were subsequently reported was objected to. Now, it is but fair, if these other bridge bills are to be passed, that the bill which I have named should be acted on at the same time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I made the announcement a moment ago that I should object to any other bills being considered until the morning business has been disposed of.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know very well what the Senator's announcement was.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My attention was diverted for a moment, or I should have objected to the consideration of these bills at the time the request was made. I think, however, we should dispose of the morning business, after which time I shall decide what my course of action shall be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] whether his request was for unanimous consent to include three bridge bills or only two of them? The understanding of the Chair was that his request included the consideration of the three bills.

Mr. OLIVER. My request was for unanimous consent for the consideration of the three bills to which I referred.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I stated that as to the matter which was under consideration at the time, I should not object; but that after that was disposed of I should object to the consideration of any other bill during the morning hour.

Mr. FLETCHER. If that is to be the program, I object to the consideration of any of these bills. I think the bill which I have named stands exactly on the same footing with the other three. I do not think it is fair to dispose of some of these bills and to leave the others unconsidered.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I simply wish to say to the Senator from Florida that two of the three bills have been passed and the third one will require but a minute. I appeal to the Senator not to interpose an objection to having this bill disposed of.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will withdraw the objection under the circumstances; but I repeat it is not fair, because the first bill reported the other day and objected to was the bill which I have named, which is now on the calendar.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I supposed the Senate had abandoned the thought of being fair in matters of legislation. Therefore I should have objected to the consideration of the other bills if I had understood the proposition in time, but unanimous consent had been given while my attention was temporarily attracted to something else. I stated, however, that after the pending bill was disposed of, for the consideration of which unanimous consent had been granted, I should object to the consideration of any other bill, and should insist upon the regular order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I can not say what the Senator from Michigan has abandoned, but I know that I have not abandoned, the thought of being fair; and if Senators can not be fair otherwise, they should be compelled to be so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the Senate, at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], gave unanimous consent for the consideration of the three bridge bills referred to by him. The third bill is now being considered.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no objection raised as to the consideration of the third bridge bill which was reported, I will say to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands, then, that there is no objection to the present consideration of the third bridge bill named by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and its consideration will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 7538) authorizing the Western New York & Pennsylvania Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Allegheny River, in Glade and Kinzua Townships, Warren County, Pa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. VARDAMAN, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 3894. An act for the relief of George H. Grace (Rept. No. 917); and

H. R. 3895. An act for the relief of F. W. Schultz (Rept. No. 918).

SPECIAL TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. CURTIS. On the 9th instant, I introduced the bill (S. 7763) prohibiting the issuance of special-tax stamps authorizing the sale of distilled spirits or other intoxicating liquors unless public notice by advertisement has been given, and for other purposes, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

REVISION OF THE PRINTING LAWS.

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 7795) to amend and revise the laws relating to printing and binding and the distribution of publications for Congress.

At the same time I submit a report (No. 910) from the committee responding to the resolution of the Senate passed December 15, 1916. It is but fair to say, Mr. President, that long before this resolution was offered the Committee on Printing had taken up the subject of economy in printing in all the departments and had reported a bill, which is on the calendar, being Senate bill 1107, Order of Business 168, designed to bring about the economies which, after the subsequent investigation, we find are so urgent upon the part of the Government. I make the report and ask that it be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in connection with this report, I merely wish to add that I hope the Senate some morning will pass this bill——

Mr. GALLINGER. Or some afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is no objection to the provisions of this bill. They have been taken out of the regular printing bill, everything that was objected to in the previous bill having been eliminated. The bill, if passed, will save to the Government of the United States $436,000 every year, and no one will be hurt. On some other occasion, when we have more time at our disposal, we can pass the other part of the printing bill, which will save another $400,000. This bill has nothing in it to which anybody can object, and I certainly hope that it will at an early day pass the Senate in the morning hour.

Mr. FLETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah, who is very familiar with the financial condition of the Government, whether he can see in the scope of his vision some place to save something like $400,000,000, which the Government sadly needs at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. This is merely a beginning, Mr. President. It will be, I fear, absolutely impossible to save anything like the amount suggested by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a beginning at the end of the Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, further, in connection with this report, I call attention to the fact that the Committee on Printing reported on February 25, 1916, a bill which is on the calendar, as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] has stated. That bill included the economies to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has referred, along with others. The total net economies provided for by that bill would have amounted to $798,013. That bill has been on the calendar ever since last February. We have made every effort we could to get it up, but we have not been able to secure its consideration. There were some features of it objected to, as the Senator from Utah has mentioned; but the bill now reported would seem to eliminate all those features; and I certainly join with other Senators in hoping that we will find time to act upon this bill and effect the economies that are mentioned, particularly in view of the present financial situation of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go to the calendar.

ELLA M. JONES.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate resolution 302, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Ella M. Jones, widow of Frank G. Jones, late a private of the police force of the Senate Office Building, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to insert a preamble to read as follows:

Whereas the late Frank G. Jones has served continuously as an employee of the Senate for more than 40 years: Be it.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Mr. President, I will say that it is customary to appropriate six months' salary to the widow of a deceased employee; but as this man saw over 40 years' service in the employ of the Senate it is proposed to allow his widow one year's salary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I shall not object to the consideration of that resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Tennessee in all good conscience if this is not a dangerous principle for us now to establish, giving a year's salary to the widow of a deceased employee simply because of his long service?

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. We found that the precedent had already been established. There have been at least two such cases heretofore.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are two other precedents, I know.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. As I was about to say, there have been at least two such cases where employees have had continuous service for more than 40 years, as had this man, where a full year's salary was allowed to his widow instead of the usual six months' salary. This is a peculiarly worthy case. The widow is absolutely destitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I will not object. I understand that the other side has gone on record against increasing the salaries of the poorly paid employees of the Government, and if they wish to depart from the usual amount given to the widows of deceased employees I will not object.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. In this case we were merely following the precedent that had been established by the other side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. I object, Mr. President. I am willing to pay the usual sum, six months' salary, to the widow of this employee, the same as we have done in other cases; but I do not think this is a case that calls for the appropriation of a full year's salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to let the resolution pass with an amendment providing that the widow shall be paid six months' salary.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I did not understand the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say that if the Senator will agree to an amendment applying in this case the same rule which we have applied in other cases, I will not object to the resolution. I am very anxious to see it go through, but I will not agree that a whole year's salary shall be paid to the widow of this employee or any other employee.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. As I have stated, that has been done where there has been service for a longer period than 40 years.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been done; but this is a time when we want to retrench, to do all we can to reduce the enormous expenses of the Government, and it is not a time, in my opinion, to provide for the payment of a year's salary to the widow of a deceased employee. As I have said, however, I shall not object to the resolution if an amendment is made providing for the payment of six months' salary.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is the author of the resolution, and I can not agree to the amendment suggested without the consent of that Senator.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, this is an extraordinary case; there has been no case like it before the Senate. This man had been employed here for over 40 years, he had reared a family, he had worked for a meager salary, he had performed his duties well, and he has left his family without means. It seems to me that, under these extraordinary circumstances, there ought not to be any hesitation about allowing a year's salary to his widow.

It is all well enough to talk about economy; I am very much in favor of economy myself; but I prefer to indulge in methods of economy in matters in which millions and scores of millions are involved, rather than in respect to a little compensation to the widow of a man who had served the Senate faithfully and well for over 40 years. The case is out of line with the usual cases of the kind that come before us, and I do not think there ought to be a moment's hesitation about granting this amount.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it is not out of line with other cases. Even in cases where men have served here for 50 years the usual rule has been to give their widows six months' salary. This widow will receive $550 if six months' compensation is allowed, and I do not think the amount should be increased beyond that. I knew Mr. Jones; I was fond of him; he was a splendid man and an efficient officer. I do not want, however, to make an exception of this kind, and so I shall object to the consideration of the resolution unless it is amended so as to provide not more than six months' compensation to the widow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution will go to the calendar.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $24,649.57 for paving streets in Sault Ste. Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for study of methods of clearing off logged-off lands, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $35,000 for the purchase, preparation, and irrigation of not to exceed 150 acres of land in Chico, Butte County, Cal., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 19359), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the number of levelers at $1,200 each in the Water Department, District of Columbia, from one to two, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19119), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,600 to grade and improve Wyoming Avenue NW., Washington, D. C., between Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Streets, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19119), which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TERMINATION OF PRESENT SESSION.

Mr. WALSH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 313), which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the present session will, without any action on the part of this body and without action or concurrence of the House of Representatives, terminate at 12 o'clock meridian on March 4, 1917.

TARGET PRACTICE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 314), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy, if not incompatible with the public interest, be directed to send to the Senate the scores made on the 30 by 90 foot screen target by the Atlantic Battleship Fleet in division and day individual battle practice in the seasons of 1914, 1915, and 1916, the figures to be given both as noted by Admiral Mayo and other umpires on the spot, and also as subsequently modified by the camera observations.

OIL-LEASING BILL.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement of the California delegation in support of the oil-leasing bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 11, 1917.

Wrong impressions concerning the oil situation in California, and particularly the remedial provisions contained in the leasing bill, have been created in many places, and we desire to make the following statement, which we hope may tend to remove the same and cause a better understanding of the situation:

Up to March 1, 1916, there had been withdrawn from entry in the Western States 48,393,197 acres of supposed coal lands, 5,603,295 acres of oil lands, and 2,581,339 acres of phosphate lands, most of which had been withdrawn for several years.

The West, to go forward and prosper, must have an opportunity to develop its natural resources. It needs, and the whole country needs, the use of its coal for fuel, its phosphate for fertilizing its farms, and its oil for gasoline, kerosene, lubricants, and the many other uses to which it is being put in the sciences and the arts.

Secretary Lane has ever been mindful of the necessity of enacting laws which will develop these great resources under proper restrictions and Government control, and has recommended a bill to Congress for that purpose, which bill has passed the House twice and is now pending in the Senate.

California is most vitally concerned in the development of its oil fields, which can not be accomplished until the leasing bill becomes a law. On September 27, 1909, President Taft issued an order withdrawing over 1,000,000 acres of land in California, a large portion of which is unpatented land, which embraces the oil fields located in the San Joaquin and Kern River districts. Although it was intended by this order, and so expressed, that valid existing claims were not to be disturbed, still the result has been to cast a doubt upon the validity of a great many claims. Suits have been commenced by the Government to cancel some, and other suits are threatened, with the result that the oil industry of California has been paralyzed and development work has practically stopped. The whole country suffers from this unhappy situation, as well as California, because of the diminishing of the oil production on the Pacific coast, which, in a great measure, affects the whole oil supply of the Nation, and which has resulted in an increase in the price of gasoline and all petroleum products, thereby affecting everyone who drives a machine, owns a combustion engine, lubricates machinery, or lights a home. It therefore will be seen that the question involved in the pending bill, with its relief provisions for the California oil producers, is not a local one, but one which affects the whole country.

When the order was made withdrawing this large tract of land more than 95 per cent of the California claimants had already entered upon it under the mining laws and initiated their claims, and many thousands of dollars had at that time been expended in development work. These entries were not only lawfully made, but were encouraged by the laws of the United States. They believed that the order of withdrawal did not interfere with their locations, but invited them to proceed with their work, because the order provided that all existing valid claims might proceed to entry in the usual manner. On December 12, 1912, more than three years after the order of withdrawal and after millions of dollars had been expended and valuable oil properties created, a naval reserve known as Naval Reserve No. 2 was ordered covering a portion of the land withdrawn.

The opposition to the oil-leasing bill is due principally to the Navy and its efforts to hold this reserve and appropriate for its use all the millions invested there long before the reserve was thought of. The remedial provisions in the bill recognize the equities of the oil companies and give them the right to relinquish their claims to the Government and receive a lease therefor upon paying a one-eighth royalty. It is also provided that the oil companies may pursue their rights for a patent for the land upon which oil had been discovered where the mining laws have been complied with.

The Navy justifies its demands upon the ground that it is necessary that it should have the oil for its use that is within this particular reserve. This reserve can not be used to store oil for the future use of the Navy, because there are already over 200 wells drilled within its limits. These wells, in the estimate of the Bureau of Mines, have already drained this reserve of fully one-third of its entire content. Fully two-thirds of this reserve is now in private ownership, patents therefor having been issued.

Through some technicality of the law the Navy hopes to be able to hold this property within Naval Reserve No. 2, but Congress, viewing the equities of the case and not wishing to do an injustice and a grievous wrong, can give relief by passing the leasing bill. This bill has passed the House twice and is now pending in the Senate, having been favorably reported by the Public Lands Committee of that body, and its passage is of great national importance.

The fears of the Navy are unfounded, because there is an abundance of oil which it can secure from publicly owned lands without taking the wells drilled and owned by private citizens and the oil therefrom, which is being used in the industries of the country. Naval Reserve No. 1 covers an area of 38,117 acres, and is estimated to contain 100,000,000 barrels. Naval Reserve No. 3 embraces 9,520 acres, with an estimate of 30,000,000 barrels, while Naval Reserve No. 4, created December 6, 1916, is estimated by the Geological Survey to contain 1,000,000,000 barrels. The Government also owns over 3,200,000 acres of withdrawn petroleum lands from which it can create other reserves containing many millions of barrels more.

OSAGE INDIAN SCHOOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, morning busines is closed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4420, to amend the postal laws.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama withhold that motion to permit me to make a request that the Chair lay before the Senate a Senate bill which has been amended by the House? If the House amendments are not agreed to at this session, it will cause the closing of a school which is now attended by 140 Indian pupils. The measure will lead to no debate, and it is very important that the bill be enacted into law as soon as possible.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6864) providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of 10 years from January 1, 1917, which were, on page 1, lines 7 and 8, to strike out "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior"; on page 1; line 10, strike out "not exceeding 10 years" and insert "one year"; on page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out ", on the condition of establishing vocational instruction in such schools"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of one year from January 1, 1917."

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

House bill 15914, an act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

IMPORTATION OF SISAL AND MANILA HEMP.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask permission to make the following report:

On February 7, 1916, a resolution, being Senate resolution 94, was submitted by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It merely provided for the appointment of a committee to investigate the sisal and binding-twine condition. The committee has completed its report, but can not make that report to the Senate until this resolution has been adopted. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have the resolution considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 94 (S. Rept. No. 919), submitted by Mr. RANSDELL, February 7, 1916, as follows:

Whereas binding twine is one of the large items of expense in the production of grain; and

Whereas it has been alleged in the public press and by individuals that the present price thereof is exorbitant and is fixed and controlled by certain persons and corporations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, or any subcommittee appointed by said committee, be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to investigate and report to Congress what companies and corporations are engaged in the importation of said sisal and manila hemp and the production of binding twine, and to what extent, if any, they control the price thereof, and whether there are any combinations or agreements to fix and control the wholesale or retail prices of sisal and manila binding twine in the United States.

The committee is authorized to administer oaths, subpœna witnesses, and send for persons and papers in the prosecution of the said investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, what is this resolution? Does it raise a committee to make an investigation?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the investigation has been made, but the committee is unable to make its report until the resolution has been adopted. The committee is ready to make its report.

Mr. STONE. How did the committee make the investigation in the first instance?

Mr. GRONNA. By authority of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. STONE. By the act of the committee?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Well, why can not the committee report?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that under the authority granted to this subcommittee by the Agricultural Committee we would have to report back to the Agricultural Committee, and we wanted to report directly to the Senate. This is a resolution that was offered some time ago that would permit us to report directly to the Senate. We should like to have that authority.

Mr. STONE. Does it involve an expenditure?

Mr. RANSDELL. None at all. All that has been undergone. It is just a formal matter.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, is this the report of a committee?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is the report of a subcommittee appointed by the Agricultural Committee to investigate the sisal and binding-twine situation.

Mr. CLARK. Exactly so; but the resolution authorizes the committee, or a subcommittee, to investigate and report, does it not?

Mr. RANSDELL. It authorizes a subcommittee, or the entire committee, to make the investigation; but we have already had authority from the full committee to make it. The report is a unanimous one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what we are voting on. There is nothing on earth to prevent the committee from making the report, if it has made an investigation. It seems to me that the only object is to make the report responsive to some particular Senator's resolution, when as a matter of fact it is not responsive to that resolution. It is sought to adopt the resolution after the report has been completed, and then make the report as if it were in answer to that resolution, when, as I understand, it was not in response to that resolution, but was the independent action of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will state to the Senator that a resolution was offered and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It was not reported back to the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; but the committee thought, and so decided, that it had ample power to make the investigation under its general authority. It thereupon appointed a subcommittee, composed of three Senators—the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and myself—to make this investigation. We made the investigation, and I will say that we worked very hard upon it. Inadvertently we were of the opinion that we had a right to report back directly to the Senate, and we so reported to the Senate three days ago. When our report reached the officials of the Senate they saw that we were reporting to the Senate under a resolution which never had been adopted. There is no question about our authority to act under the resolution of the Agricultural Committee; but we were not acting under a formal resolution of the Senate itself, and we are simply asking now that this resolution, which was introduced nearly a year ago, be adopted in order that we may make our report to the Senate itself.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would it not be proper to ask the Senate to receive the report and have it printed without this resolution?

Mr. RANSDELL. That would be entirely satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the report was not printed in the RECORD? I remember the Senator making that request.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was not printed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, the request was made for it?

Mr. RANSDELL. The request was made, and it was not granted.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not printed?

Mr. RANSDELL. It has not been printed. It was found that the resolution under which we sought to report had not been adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is quite clear that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry under their authority as a committee investigated this subject. I do not think they even needed to have a resolution to investigate it. They did investigate the subject, and after investigating the subject they made their report. Now, they desire to make that report responsive to some particular resolution that never was considered or adopted by the Senate. It seems to me to be almost an unheard-of proposition, and that there is nothing to prevent the committee making its report, as it already has done, and that report being accepted by the Senate and the matter disposed of.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senate is willing to accept the report, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that is all we wish. We wish our report accepted by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. The difficulty with that is that this is not the report of a committee. It is the report of a subcommittee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that if a subcommittee investigated the matter I should think the subcommittee would report to the committee that appointed it, and then let the committee adopt the report of the subcommittee and report it to the Senate, if the committee favors the report of the subcommittee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution will go to the calendar.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Saturday, the 17th day of February, 1917, immediately after the routine morning business, the Senate will be asked to consider resolutions in commemoration of the life, character, and public services of Senator BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, of Indiana; of Senator EDWIN C. BURLEIGH, of Maine; and of Senator JAMES P. CLARKE, of Arkansas.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4429, to amend the postal laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4429.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the title be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4429) to amend the postal laws.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the bill may be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no letter, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet, or publication of any kind containing any advertisement of spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind, or containing a solicitation of an order or orders for said liquors, or any of them, shall be deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or be delivered by any postmaster or letter carrier, when addressed or directed to any person, firm, corporation, or association, or other addressee, at any place or point in any State or Territory of the United States at which it is by the law in force in the State or Territory at that time unlawful to advertise or solicit orders for such liquors, or any of them, respectively.

Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited or shall knowingly send or cause to be sent anything to be conveyed or delivered by mail in violation of the provisions of this section, or shall knowingly deliver or cause to be delivered by mail anything herein forbidden to be carried by mail shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and for any subsequent offense shall be imprisoned not more than five years. Any person violating any provision of this section may be tried and punished, either in the district in which the unlawful matter or publication was mailed or to which it was carried by mail for delivery, according to direction thereon, or in which it was caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it was addressed.

SEC. 2. That whoever, being a postmaster or other person employed in the Postal Service, shall knowingly send by mail or deliver any letter, package, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet, or publication of any kind containing any advertisement of the said liquors or any of them mentioned in the first section of this act, or containing a solicitation of an order or orders for said liquors, or any of them, when addressed or directed to any person, firm, corporation, or association, or other addressee, at any place or point in any State or Territory of the United States at which it is by the law in force in the State or Territory at that time unlawful to advertise or solicit orders for such liquors, or any of them, respectively, shall be fined not more than $100 or imprisonment not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 3. That any advertisement for such liquors, or any of them, stating the person from whom, or the firm or corporation from which, or the place where, or the price at which, or the method by which said liquors, or any of them, may be obtained, or containing the picture of a brewery or distillery or bottles or other receptacles designed to serve as an advertisement of such liquors, or any of them, shall be within the inhibition of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been read by the Secretary.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement as to the purpose and object of the bill.

There are a number of States—the State of Alabama being one—in which whisky advertising is prohibited by State law; and this bill simply seeks to prevent the use of the mails for whisky advertising going into States where the State law itself prohibits such advertising. It does not apply to any other State. It does not apply to any State where a portion of its territory is dry and a portion of it permits the sale of spirituous liquor. It is simply an effort, in the case of States where legislation on this subject has been passed and is now in force, to enable the States to enforce their own laws with reference to prohibition. That is all the bill is intended to accomplish, and I can see no reason why there should be any objection to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand the matter, it simply puts the same ban upon newspapers out of a State that is put upon newspapers in a State. Is that it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the idea exactly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would the Senator have any objection to incorporating in the bill the names of the States having such laws?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would have no objection, as far as I am concerned, but I am not advised as to the number of States. It is a general proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me present this example: How is a person, for instance, living in California to know when he mails a newspaper or a letter whether or not he is violating the law, if the Senator himself does not know? Should not the law which prohibits the sending of such matter in the mail state distinctly to the people what States have enforced these laws? Is it to be necessary, for instance, for a newspaper publisher who sends newspapers into every State in the Union through exchange to ask his lawyer to look up the law of 48 States? If he is to be penalized for violating the law, the law ought certainly to make it clear what acts are unlawful.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I apprehend that every liquor dealer in this country, I do not care whether he lives in California or where he may live, knows, or at least is supposed to know, where advertising of this character is prohibited.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not the point. A man publishes a newspaper in a State. He sends those newspapers not only to subscribers who come into his business office without his knowledge but he sends them to exchange publications in perhaps 30 or perhaps 40 States in the Union. He is under an obligation to send a copy to every advertiser, wherever he is in the United States. He may send papers into 48 States. Must he inquire into the law of each of the 48 States to know whether he can send newspapers into a State or if he sends into such a State does he incurr the penalty involved in this proposed law? It seems to me the confession of the Senator himself that he does not know what States have such laws is a warrant for incorporating into the bill this information on the subject.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As far as I am individually concerned, I confess there is merit in the proposition. I would not object, as far as I am concerned, to exempting newspapers exclusively for exchange purposes or——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me make a suggestion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator it does not affect me particularly, it does not affect many newspapers, because there is a gradual tendency of the newspapers to exclude liquor advertisements of every sort, but as a general principle it is wrong to pass a law and not have the law itself show exactly what the violation may be. If there is any information available as to what States have these laws that information ought to be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator yield for a suggestion there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to suggest that if you name the States you would have to have an act of Congress every year changing them, because the States change their own laws.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a simple matter.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not a simple matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is no trouble about finding out what they are——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield? There are five Senators on the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought the Senator from Alabama had finished.

There is no trouble in finding out which States prohibit it. You can apply to any liquor dealer in the United States, to any large wholesaler, and he will furnish you a list. The newspapers of the country can easily know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a statute of the United States, and the thousands of newspaper publishers in the country ought to be able to read this law and know by reading the law what would be a violation of its criminal provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under the vague terms here it would be a criminal violation of the law to send a paper into a State that prohibited the circulation of liquor advertisements, when, as the Senator in charge of the bill himself says, he does not know what States have such laws; and I must confess I do not know. It makes it absolutely necessary for every publisher to watch the legislation of 48 States in order to keep track of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is not a particle of trouble in any publisher finding out. The laws may change. To undertake to put in the act the name of the States now meeting the requirements of this bill and limit to them would be to exclude from the benefits of the act the States which next year may adopt a prohibitory law. A State next year might repeal its law. It should apply in its terms to those States that have the law. There is not a bit of trouble in finding out which States they are. There is not a man who could not send a law clerk to the law library downstairs or upon inquiry at the Congressional Reference Bureau of the Library of Congress get in 15 minutes the list. They will all be published, and as changes are made they will be published. I do not suppose there is a newspaper office in the United States where there is not an employee who knows the list of States to which the bill will apply.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there is not, he can find out without the slightest difficulty from the list which will at once be published in all the leading papers as soon as this bill becomes a law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows very well that there are 48 different jurisdictions in the United States. A man does very well if he can avoid violating the laws of his own State, let alone violating the laws of 47 other States. It is unfair to pass a drastic law of this kind; and yet I am in favor of the law. I believe in excluding liquor advertisements from the mails of the United States in those States where the local law prohibits it.

I will say that many newspapers, the best newspapers of the country, have already adopted the policy of excluding liquor advertisements; but I believe on the general principle it is not right to incorporate a criminal provision in a law and then say to a man in one State, "If you violate the law of 47 other States you are liable to a jail penalty."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To say to a newspaper you shall not send a paper into a State unless you find out whether the laws of the State forbid the advertisement of liquor in newspapers is not a severe tax. A newspaper ought not to be allowed to send it into a State unless it would take that trouble.

There are probably one-third of the States to-day who forbid it; I hope in a few months there will be one-third more; and as they are added I want these advertisements kept out. I do not think it would be a severe provision to say that the newspapers which carry liquor advertisements should not go through the mails at all. But we do not go that far. We simply say that if you send them into a State you shall take the burden of finding out that the law of the State permits liquor advertisements to be sent into the State. It is not a severe burden; it is easily found out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I challenge the Senator. I say he can not find out in an hour in what States a violation of this law would be involved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I had a newspaper I could find out before I had to mail it to-morrow morning. Just as soon as this bill passes a list is sure to be published giving the names of the States from which liquor advertisements will be excluded. These States will be at once universally known. With great respect for the Senator I must urge that he has suggested a difficulty without merit.

Mr. VARDAMAN and Mr. OLIVER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield first to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I was about to observe that many of the States now have laws prohibiting the sale of newspapers containing liquor advertisements. This bill, if enacted into a law, would impose no greater hardships or make it more difficult for the newspapers to find out that liquor advertisements were not permitted in the States that have acted on this matter than the laws already upon the statute books of the States. The fact is, I do not see how any newspaper is going to be inconvenienced, led into a snare, or forced to do anything difficult of attainment by the enactment of the bill. It will, however, prevent the circulation of papers containing liquor advertisements, take from the newspaper publishers a few paltry dollars derived from that source, but the good which would result to the entire country by prohibiting circulation of these advertisements outweighs and overbalances all losses that the publishers might suffer. I think the better class of newspapers have about determined that whisky advertisements are not desirable business and very naturally respect for public sentiment has caused most of the publishers to refuse this class of business; all of which I wish to commend as presaging better things for the future.

Now, Mr. President, I take no stock whatever in the views expressed by some Senators when the prohibition or whisky question comes up for discussion that these laws are sumptuary in their nature and restrictive of the rights of the American citizen. In the first place, under our form of government, a Government which in theory at least derives all of its just powers from the consent of the governed, no citizen is vouchsafed a right the exercise of which involves infidelity to his family, disloyalty to his Government, and a flagitious crime against posterity. That to my mind is self-evident. The traffic in alcoholic stimulants has been outlawed by all the civilized nations of the earth and it is the consensus of the most enlightened opinion in the world that the excessive use of alcoholic stimulants causes more crimes, insanity, poverty, makes more orphans, widows, blights more lives—in a word causes more sorrow and suffering than all other agencies for evil combined. Anything that encourages the use of liquor is an enemy to the human race. It promotes lawlessness and foments strife, and therefore the traffic in it should be outlawed and prohibited by law. Governments are made for men rather than men for governments, and when the government ceases to serve mankind for the benefit of mankind its usefulness ceases. The argument has been advanced that if a State permits its citizen to buy even a limited quantity of liquor it ought to permit the newspapers or dealers in liquors to let the citizen know where he can get it. Now, I am not so much interested in keeping the fellow who wants to buy the liquor from reading newspaper advertisements as I am to prevent liquor dealers from finding out the whereabouts of the man down in Mississippi or Georgia to whom he would like to sell his poison. I want to keep the temptation out of the citizen's way. I realize that the best part of the Lord's prayer, the one that has served humanity best, is that which says, "Lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil." There is much potency in mere suggestion, and for that reason, Mr. President, I am supporting this bill. I think it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to enact this bill into law and stop the circulation of newspapers containing whisky advertisements in the States that have legislated on the subject. I hope from the depths of my heart that the time is not far distant when every State in this Republic will have outlawed the whisky traffic and all men will avoid this enemy to health and happiness as they do a plague of cholera or any other deadly pestilence.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona and Mr. OLIVER addressed the Chair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems to me that the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Arizona. I will yield next to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that the bill should contain a provision not only for the States that now have these inhibition laws but for the States that shall hereafter prohibit the liquor traffic.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I accept that. I think it is an admirable suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That would cure the difficulty and avoid the necessity of future legislation in regard to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let the clerks insert at the proper place "or hereafter."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I suggest that the objection raised by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] might be met by so amending the bill as to authorize or direct the Postmaster General from time to time to designate the States whose legislation prohibits the circulation of such publications and that would be notice to the public and enable everyone to be informed as to the States into which they can not send such publications.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. I suggest to the Senator who reported the bill that such an amendment be incorporated in it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to section 2 and to say that it is a part of the bill that is not at all necessary for its proper enforcement. I am satisfied that section would work a hardship on postmasters. It applies only to the postmasters, and makes it a crime for a postmaster or anyone employed in the office who shall knowingly send by mail or deliver any letter, package, and so forth, containing an advertisement for liquor, and makes him liable to a penalty of $100 fine and imprisonment for one year, or both.

While this section does provide that this must be done knowingly, I can see, I think, how there might be a vast amount of difficulty arise if the postmaster was honestly trying to enforce the law as to whether he ought to send or deliver a newspaper or a package.

It seems to me that if we want to make it a crime for a publisher or other person to send such matter through the mail, he ought to be confined to that, and we should not put this hardship upon the employees of the Post Office Department. There might be quite a large post office with several hundred employees; an employee might have knowledge of a certain law in a certain State and in the ordinary routine of business he would handle some publication that went into that State. There would always be a question as to his knowledge, even though he did not have it, and a great deal of difficulty would arise in case he was prosecuted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me suggest to the Senator that it would be impossible to enforce this law if some such provision was not in it. It may be that it is not in the most perfect form, but there should be some provision of this kind as against those who handle the mail. It is not supposed that the postmaster opens the letters or reads even the postal cards, and I do not believe you could convict a person under this act without——

Mr. NORRIS. The difficulty, I think, would arise in handling newspapers more than anything else.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As a matter of fact, newspapers usually come in wrappers. He is not supposed to open those; he can not read all that is in a newspaper; but it seems to me if somebody would go to the postmaster and say, "Here is a violation of the law in this particular newspaper that is being circulated, and I call your attention to it," and there should come to the post office a newspaper of that kind it ought to be his duty to prevent the same from being circulated.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be the easiest thing in the world, it seems to me, to convict the publisher of a paper for sending it out; he knows what is in his paper, and there would be no difficulty in securing convictions under this law; but an employee in the post office who is to handle it might have read it in the morning, and in the course of that day he might be required to deliver this publication to the train or from the train to some other official. He ought not to be compelled, it seems to me, to stop in the performance of his official duty and say, "These papers can not be delivered." He might notify his superior officer probably that he had reason to believe that such a publication that was going through the post office contained liquor advertisements and addressed to some party in the State where perhaps there was a law against it. The publication of an advertisement is something easily proven; there is no difficulty attached to it. Why add this burden upon all the employees of the Post Office Department?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is no burden at all on the post-office employees. If they do not know the paper contains the advertisement they are not responsible.

Mr. NORRIS. But they would——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say the main purpose of this bill is not to reach newspapers, but it is to reach manufacturers and wholesalers of whisky, whose circulars go into towns direct with an advertisement of some kind relating to the sale of whisky, with all kinds of pictures, sent to every man in the community. They send them to schools; they send them wherever they suppose they can effect a sale. That is the main purpose of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Wait a minute.

Mr. NORRIS. I am waiting.

Mr. BANKHEAD. When we get in behind the people who manufacture and sell whisky and stop them from advertising there will be no trouble at all with the postmasters in delivering the mail, because none of the matter forbidden will be sent; and if they should accidentally deliver one without knowledge they are not liable.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, if the Senator is through, I wish to take the floor in my own right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not yield the floor. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I will wait until the Senator finishes, then.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. While the Senator from Alabama still has the floor——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator a question about the construction of section 2. The provision is, I understand, that whoever, being a postmaster or other person in the employment of the Postal Service, shall knowingly send by mail or deliver any of these letters or packages containing liquor advertisements into territory where, by law, circulation of such advertisements is forbidden, is guilty of an offense.

I ask the Senator whether or not the word "knowingly" would apply to the state of mind of the postmaster or other postal agent with reference to the existence of the law in the State or whether the knowledge is to be confined to the character of advertising.

In other words, to make myself entirely clear, suppose a newspaper is mailed to some particular office. That newspaper contains a liquor advertisement. The postmaster knows the existence of that advertisement, but he does not know that there is a law in the State to which it is to be sent which forbids the circulation of such advertisements, but it afterwards turns out that there is such a law. Would that constitute a violation of the section?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that we have already amended the bill so as to provide that the Postmaster General from time to time shall publish a list of the States where this law is to be effective and operative. That, of course, gives notice to every postmaster, to every dealer, and to everybody else. In other words, as to the States where their legislatures have prohibited advertisements within the States, we have amended the bill so as to provide that the Postmaster General shall publish that list. If in the future a State should go into that list, the Postmaster General is to give notice through the Post Office Department. That, it seems to me, would answer the Senator's question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that I quite sympathize with the purpose of this act and I entirely agree with the provisions contained in section 1; but I am not at all sure that it is wise to impose a penalty, as provided in section 2, upon every postmaster of every crossroads post office of the country and upon every postal employee through whose hands forbidden advertising matter of this kind may pass.

I will ask the Senator from Alabama, who is more familiar with the subject than am I, a question. We have laws which forbid the circulation of obscene matter through the mail, which forbid the circulation of advertisements of lotteries, the circulation of matter which is of a fraudulent character. Now, can the Senator from Alabama tell us whether the law in all those cases penalizes the postmaster who may permit matter of that kind to be sent through the post office or to be delivered at the post office?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the law in that respect is about the same as is this proposed law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was under the impression that it was not, but the Senator from Alabama may be right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I am not positive; I do not assert it as a fact; but, as I have said, the purpose of this bill is to prohibit the use of the mails in the carrying of whisky advertisements in the States where the laws of the States prohibit such advertisements. We propose to require the Postmaster General to publish from time to time a list of the States in the Union that will come within the provisions of this proposed law. That, of course, will put every postmaster on notice. If a postmaster should accidentally or otherwise permit a letter to pass through his hands containing such matter, without his knowledge, he would not, of course, be subject to the provisions of this act. That provision, to my mind, is only intended to apply at the point of delivery and not at the original mailing point.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, let me make this suggestion to the Senator from Alabama: The postmasters and the employees of the Post Office Department are, of course, all under the direction and control of the Postmaster General. If a postmaster is knowingly and willfully permitting a violation of any laws of this character, he can be reached and disciplined by the Post Office Department. Therefore is there any real need of penalizing him in addition to all that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That might depend, Mr. President, upon whether the Post Office Department was desirous of very thoroughly enforcing the law. I think it had better be left to the communities where the injury is to result, if there is an injury, to see to the prosecution of the violators of the law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am in favor of the bill; it will undoubtedly do some good; but I should like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama what is the purpose of the friends of the bill, and the object to be accomplished by it, in placing a limitation on the character of the liquor advertisements to be prohibited? Why pick out certain kinds of liquor advertisements and prohibit them and allow other kinds?

Mr. BANKHEAD. This includes all character of advertisements.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What character of advertisement is not included?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is only a special class of liquor advertisements prohibited. Those advertisements are set out and described in section 3, specifically mentioning certain kinds of liquor advertisements that are excluded from the mails. Of course, that would allow any liquor advertisements not described. This is the description of the particular kinds of liquor advertisements prohibited:

SEC. 3. That any advertisement for such liquors, or any of them, stating the person from whom, or the firm or corporation from which, or the place where, or the price at which, or the method by which said liquors, or any of them, may be obtained, or containing the picture of a brewery or distillery or bottles or other receptacles designed to serve as an advertisement of such liquors, or any of them * * *.

Under this bill any liquor advertisement that did not contain the name of the person from whom the liquor could be obtained, the place where it could be obtained, or which did not contain a picture of a brewery or of a bottle or of a receptacle of the liquor would not be excluded from the mails. Of course, this will be a criminal law, Mr. President, and, therefore, to be strictly construed. As the Senator is perfectly well aware, the general rule as to the construction of a penal statute is to that effect. An advertisement of a familiar brand of beer or whisky in the ordinary form in which such advertisements are placed does not go into detail as to the name of the person from whom they could be obtained or the place where they are to be sold or the name of the corporation, or contain a picture of the distillery or of the bottles in which the liquors are contained. It is a very rare thing that such advertisements contain any such information. The fact of the case is that they generally simply advertise the name of the whisky or the name of the beer, some well-known brand, which has a market value through the long years in which the business has been built up. That is the ordinary form in which such advertisements are placed, and none of them could be excluded by any court to whom this act was submitted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, all I have to say, in response to that, is that we believe that this bill, when it becomes a law, will make it much more difficult for people to get whisky than it is now; and that is one of the objects which we are trying to accomplish.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If that is the Senator's object, why does he not strike out the specific description and leave the section stand, that any advertisement of such liquors, or any of them, shall be within the provisions of this act? That would accomplish the purpose. Strike out of section 3, beginning in line 7, all after the word "them," and all of the section from that down to and including the word "them," in line 12. Then it would exclude all liquor advertisements, which, I understand, is the purpose of the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator from Washington make a motion to strike that matter out of the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was not my purpose; but I will now make that motion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the Senator will not do so, or, if he does so, I hope his amendment will not be adopted, because I think it will absolutely destroy the purpose of the bill.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who has just spoken, to the fact that in section 1, line 4, of the bill the description is "any advertisement of spirituous, vinus, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind." That is the general description of the offense. Section 3 simply selects some liquors, as mentioned by the Senator, and provides that they also shall come within the prohibitions of the act. The first section still contains the general description, and then there is a specific designation of well-known means that might be adopted to evade the act. I do not think the mentioning of those particular things in section 3 would nullify the general description in section 1. What does the Senator from Washington think about that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not like to differ on a legal proposition with the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, but I am compelled to do so in this case. I think that the special provision governs the general provision. It always does so in a matter of statutory construction.

Mr. CHILTON. Now, merely let me suggest to the Senator, suppose——

Mr. POINDEXTER. But, furthermore—if the Senator will allow me to complete the answer to his question——

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If, according to the Senator's own construction, section 1 excludes all such advertisements, what is the necessity for specifying certain particular kinds in section 3?

Mr. CHILTON. Now, let me call the attention of the Senator to this idea: In section 3, if he will turn to it, in line 12, where it says that certain things "shall be within the inhibition of this act," suppose we should say "shall also be within the inhibition of this act." Then, clearly that would show a legislative intent not to make the specific designation override the general description in the first section. Therefore, in order to make that clear, I move that the word "also" be inserted after the word "shall," in line 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat that suggestion?

Mr. CHILTON. In order to make the matter clear and to answer the criticism of the Senator from Washington, I move in section 3, page 3, line 12, to insert the word "also" between the word "shall" and the word "be," so as to read "shall also be within."

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the purpose of that? What is the Senator going to accomplish by that?

Mr. CHILTON. I am simply endeavoring to answer the objection of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and to obviate the possible construction which he suggests might be put upon the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this language in section 3 is intended to broaden the bill, and I think it does so. It says:

That any advertisement for such liquors, or any of them, stating the person from whom, or the firm or corporation from which, or the place where, or the price at which, or the method by which said liquors, or any of them, may be obtained—

I stop there. Anything, therefore, descriptive of the person from whom the liquor could be obtained, or stating how the liquor could be bought, or where it could be bought, shall be held to be an advertisement. Furthermore—or containing the picture of a brewery or distillery or bottles or other receptacles designed to serve as an advertisement of such liquors, or any of them, shall be within the inhibition of this act.

The section is simply intended to go further, and say that if a man prints his name and address, and then under it puts simply the picture of a whisky bottle, it shall be treated as an advertisement of his business, or if he puts a picture of a beer bottle under it, it shall be treated as an advertisement of his business. The section has been prepared with a view to catching the different schemes which have been resorted to by way of advertisement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. All of those would be advertisements, would they not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. CLAPP. Not necessarily. The section establishes a rule of evidence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it fixes a rule of construction and designates these as advertisements. Now, I want to ask the Senator what kind of advertisement it occurs to him section 3 does not cover?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have described the kind that it occurs to me the section does not cover, and that is the ordinary kind of whisky or beer advertisements which contain the name of the beer or whisky. That is not covered by that section.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It uses the words, "stating the person from whom, or the firm or corporation from which, or the place where, or the price at which, or the method by which, said liquors or any of them may be obtained."

Mr. POINDEXTER. That does not include an advertisement which merely specifies the brand or name of the article. One of the commonest liquor advertisements that is known merely gives the name of the commodity and then says, "That's all."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, suppose we add the words "or containing the name of a liquor," in connection with the words now found in the section, "containing the picture of a brewery or distillery or bottles or other receptacles designed to serve as an advertisement of such liquors"?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That certainly would improve it; but there may be other classes of advertisements that still would not be included.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The object was to include the devices indicated, so that the judge must recognize them as advertisements.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move, Mr. President, to amend by adding the words "or containing the name of a liquor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending. The Senator's motion will be in order later.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the objection made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is obviated by the first section of the bill, and that all kinds of liquor advertisements would be included in that first section. Section 3 was merely added as a matter of caution for the purpose of including in the prohibited advertising the particular kinds or forms of liquor advertisements indicated, and I think that they, together with section 1, would include every kind and form of liquor advertisement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. CHILTON. For the time being, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not care to pursue this matter much further. I only made a suggestion intended to point out, as I thought I ought to point out before this matter was disposed of, what seemed to me to be so obvious; and I have only one more word to say in regard to it, in answer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], which is, that instead of being an amplification of section 1 of the act it is rather a definition. That is what it would be construed by a court as being. When a law says that all liquor advertisements shall be excluded from the mails in certain territory, and then adds another section that liquor advertisements containing so and so and so and so shall be inhibited by this act, the last provision is a definition of the word "advertisement" used in the first section, and the first section will not apply to any other kind of advertisements except those in the definition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to speak again of section 2, and I do so because I am in favor of the legislation. I do not believe, however, that we ought to do anything that is unnecessary for its proper enforcement and that may bring hardship upon a good many innocent people.

In the first place, Mr. President, in prosecutions under this act it seems to me the facts would be very easily proven. The fact as to whether a newspaper contains an advertisement or not can be shown by the newspaper itself. It would be very easy to get a copy of the newspaper, and in the case of a pamphlet carried in a 1-cent unsealed envelope its nature can be very easily proven by a copy of the circular itself. In any case, whether it is against a postmaster or an employee or a man who has the liquor for sale, that evidence would perhaps be necessary to obtain a conviction, and it could be easily obtained. If the law were of such a nature that an employee of the Post Office Department might easily assist in covering it up or avoiding the law, then there might be some reason for coupling him up in the law and making him perform some duty that he otherwise, in the ordinary course of his employment, would not be called upon to perform. Section 2 provides:

> That whoever, being a postmaster or other person employed in the Postal Service, shall knowingly send by mail or deliver any letter, package, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet, or publication of any kind containing any advertisement of the said liquors * * * shall be fined—

And so forth. That would include the man who carried the mail from the post office to the train. It might be construed to include the man on the train who was distributing the mail. It would at least include every country postmaster in the United States. It would include every mail clerk in every post office in the United States. The Senator from Alabama said this was only intended to apply to the postmaster at the office where the advertising matter was delivered; but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it explicitly applies not only to him but to the postmaster at the office from which it is sent, or to any other employee having anything to do with it.

What is the necessity of doing that? We do not want to prosecute the postmaster. He is not the guilty man. The employees of the department are not guilty. We do not want to punish them. It is the fellow who sends out the advertisement that you want to get. You can get him easily, if he sends it out to any of these States, by getting a copy of the advertisement itself, which will be very easily secured without any difficulty whatever.

I can see a thousand ways in which a postmaster in some little town or a postmaster in a large city who has control of a whole lot of employees might get into difficulty. It is true the law says it must be done knowingly by him; but a whole lot of circumstances might arise in which one man would say that they did it knowingly when another man might say that they did it without knowledge. The postmaster himself, or some clerk who was conscientious and wanted to perform his duty, when he had newspapers to distribute around in the boxes, with the people all waiting on the outside to get their mail, their dailies perhaps, might see as he was distributing these newspapers some reading matter as to which he might not know positively whether it was an advertisement or whether it was not. Advertisements are often put in papers in such form that it is a matter of some difficulty to tell whether they are advertisements or not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. In one moment I will yield. He must stop right then and there at his own peril, and still he is an innocent man. He has nothing to do with the circulation of this advertisement of the sale of the liquor illegally. Why jeopardize him? Why put him into this bill when without his being in it prosecutions can be so easily proven and the right parties prosecuted and convicted?

Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to suggest to the Senator that in all probability he is conceding rather too much when he says that under section 2 the act must be knowingly done.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The word "knowingly" applies to the first part of this section, namely, that the postmaster must know that the letter or package or postal card or newspaper contains the forbidden advertisements; that is, advertisements of intoxicating liquors. But is it not true that the postmaster under section 2 just as the person mailing the forbidden thing under section 1, is bound at his peril to know the law of the State into which it is sent?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; he must know the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, think of the absurdity of compelling the thousands of post-office employees in the United States, every crossroads postmaster, to study the laws of these various States, and at his peril to ascertain every place where laws of that kind obtain. It is perfectly just that the newspaper owner, or the person who is instrumental in sending out the advertisement for his own benefit, should be compelled to know that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But if the postmaster or the clerk permits one of these advertisements to go through his hands, in ignorance of the law of the State to which it is being sent, it seems to me he ought not to be penalized. I think it is going altogether too far to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator thoroughly. In addition to that, it is not at all necessary in order to get the guilty party.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not assist in any way in getting the man who is really guilty; and I move, Mr. President, to strike out section 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 it is proposed to strike out lines 17 to 25, both inclusive, and on page 3 it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 5, both inclusive, being section 2 of the bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama, who is in charge of the bill, whether it would not be a good idea, if possible, to incorporate in this bill a provision that would make it unlawful for a telegraph or telephone company to permit a message advertising or soliciting to go over its wires to a State where advertising or soliciting of the kind described is forbidden?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. It does not affect telegrams.

Mr. STONE. I know it does not; but you might make it do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not necessary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not see how it could be applied to telegrams under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. STONE. It could be treated as interstate commerce. Another thing that occurs to me, Mr. President, is that we ought to apply this prohibitive policy to the District of Columbia. I wish to send to the desk and have read an amendment which I suggest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After line 2, page 2, it is proposed to insert:

That after the passage and approval of this act it shall be unlawful to advertise or solicit orders for such liquors, or any of them, in the District of Columbia, and that all the provisions of this act shall apply to and be in force within said District.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the idea is, through this amendment, if accepted, to protect the unwary in this District from the dangers besetting them; and also that it might have a widely beneficial effect by keeping out of the city, and therefore from the eyes of these Congressmen who assemble here—transient innocents from abroad—what is printed in the New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and St. Louis papers. To exclude these papers from the District because, forsooth, there might be some advertising in them bringing the publishers within the provisions of this proposed law would, I have no doubt, result in great benefit and have a most enlightening and uplifting effect not only on Members of Congress but upon this entire community.

These are the potent reasons that move me to suggest an amendment of the kind submitted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has raised a very important question in connection with section 2. It would seem to be going very far in this effort to regulate matters through the Post Office Department on the one hand and through the interstate-commerce feature of the Constitution and laws on the other, to police the whole country by making postmasters or other persons employed in the Postal Service—the mail carriers everywhere, and men on the trains who might handle a package or a letter that contained an order for liquors or contained an advertisement of liquors—violators of the law, and subject them to prosecution and fine and imprisonment for permitting the transmission through the mails of even a letter or a package or a postal card or a newspaper or a pamphlet or a publication of any kind that contained an advertisement or a solicitation of an order or orders for liquors, or any of them, when addressed to any person or firm in some State or some point in the United States in which it is, by law in force in the State or Territory at that time, unlawful to advertise or solicit orders for such liquors. Such postmaster or other person employed in the Postal Service sending by mail or delivering any such letter, package, postal card, circular, newspaper, or pamphlet containing any such advertisement or solicitation for order is liable to prosecution and punishment under that section.

It seems to me it is going too far, and is extreme, to subject these people to the possibility of this sort of criminal action in a matter when there might be a question whether they had knowledge or not; but that question would have to be thrashed out in the courts. They would be put to enormous expense and inconvenience, probably, and under the stain and strain of criminal charges, and practically the burden put upon them, possibly, to show that they did not have knowledge that some package or some letter which they handled, delivered, or put in the mails for delivery contained an order or a solicitation for an order or an advertisement prohibited under this law. It seems to me it is undertaking to reach out and extend this sort of legislation so as to affect injuriously people to whom it ought not to apply.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, would the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Nebraska be satisfied if we struck out section 3 of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Section 2 is the objectionable section. The motion made by the Senator from Nebraska, which is the pending question, is to strike out section 2; and I think that ought to be agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. President, if it is in order, I move to strike out sections 2 and 3 of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask what the calendar number of this bill is, so that I can find it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The calendar number of the bill is 798. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I presume the Senator from Nebraska would be willing that that motion should be entertained, to strike out sections 2 and 3 of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection myself to section 3. I really do not think section 3 is necessary, but it seems to me it adds a little to the explanation of section 1. I would rather have the vote taken separately on the two sections.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, I move to strike out section 2.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the motion I have made; that is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion that is before the Senate is to strike out section 2 of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, I move to strike out section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to be inserted at the end of section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, after the word "addressed" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the carrying by mail of a newspaper containing such advertisements when it is mailed for the purpose of serving process in legal proceedings.

Mr. POMERENE. It will occur to the Senator that it may often be necessary in litigation to insert advertisements for nonresident litigants, and under the phraseology of this law it might be improper to mail them if they contained some of this forbidden matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all right.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to have the amendment read again, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. That would take the whole paper.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all right.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the author of the amendment if it would not permit the depositing in the mail at any time of any newspaper carrying any liquor advertisements?

Mr. POMERENE. Not at all.

Mr. KIRBY. Do not all newspapers carry these nonresident notices for service by publication?

Mr. POMERENE. It would simply permit mailing a copy of such a paper to, for instance, a nonresident defendant when the paper was mailed for the purpose of perfecting service.

Mr. KIRBY. My understanding about constructive service is that, under all the statutes with which I am familiar, when you publish this notice in your paper for a certain number of days in the jurisdiction in which the suit is brought your service is completed, and you do not need to send the paper outside of the State to serve it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that may be true in the Senator's own State, but it is not true in my State of Ohio. We are obliged in these cases to mail them, and let the record show that a copy of the paper containing this advertisement has in fact been mailed to the certain address that is given, if the address is known.

Mr. KIRBY. If it is known; yes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does the amendment offered by the Senator limit it to the one notice?

Mr. POMERENE. It does. It is limited to the newspaper when it is mailed for this purpose.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I simply want to ask the Senator from Ohio if he will not amend his amendment so as to apply to the particular cases to which he refers—his own State, for example. Otherwise I think the whole matter would be rendered almost nugatory.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no. It is impossible to give it such a construction as that, and I am quite sure that the Senator will not place that construction upon it when he sees it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. Those in favor of the amendment will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.] The ayes have it.

Mr. STERLING and other Senators called for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is asked for.

Mr. LANE. I do not understand the amendment well enough to justify me in voting upon it. Is a newspaper containing a legal notice exempt?

Mr. POMERENE. I did not say so.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the Senator from Montana in charge of the unfinished business if he will be willing to let us take a vote on this question. It will not require more than two minutes, I think.

Mr. WALSH. I think that we can dispose of this matter to-morrow morning.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think it will take five minutes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It will not take five minutes, I think.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us get it out of the way. I do not want to interfere with the unfinished business more than a few minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I would have to consult my friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would require unanimous consent to temporarily lay the bill aside for the purpose of disposing of the measure which is before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I do not care to interfere with the consideration of Senate bill 4429. Postponing the consideration of the unfinished business would make no difference to me. I shall not object, as far as that is concerned, to that, because I propose to have something to do with that myself. So far as I am concerned, I shall not object to unanimous consent to lay the unfinished business aside.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To lay it temporarily aside.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the Senator from Montana if he will not consent to have the bill laid aside temporarily until we can dispose of the pending bill.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana is willing that unanimous consent shall be given that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like the ruling of the Chair as to the effect of unanimous consent upon temporarily laying aside the bill advocated by the Senator from Montana, which is now before the Senate. What would be the effect on the balance of the day's procedings? Would the bill then have to come up by motion?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARK. I am asking the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am certain what the ruling of the Chair will be when the point is made.

Mr. CLARK. I was curious in my own mind to know what the effect would be.

Mr. STERLING. I called for a division on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. It is laid aside, without objection.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to suggest, to put this beyond all doubt, a request for unanimous consent that the bill constituting the unfinished business now before the Senate be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the bill of which the Senator from Alabama is in charge, and that at the conclusion of that consideration the unfinished business be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That, the Chair understands, is the proposition of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. That is my understanding of the effect of the rule; but I recognize that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has had long experience in this Chamber, and when he raises a question as to whether that is the correct view naturally my apprehensions are aroused and I must ask the Chair for information, to rule upon the point made by the Senator from Wyoming as to what the status of the matter will be when the pending postal bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The judgment of the Chair would be that temporarily laying aside the unfinished business, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, the bill in charge of the Senator from Alabama will be before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not claim to be overversed in parliamentary methods, and if there is a question before the Senate as to the wisdom of the decision the Chair will have no hesitancy in having the Senate decide it.

Mr. SWANSON. It has been uniformly held, I think repeatedly, that where unanimous consent is given to temporarily lay a bill aside it does not lose its place as unfinished business, because we are proceeding by unanimous consent, and if any Senator objects to further proceeding with the bill that is temporarily before the Senate by unanimous consent, then the unfinished business comes up. It has been the ruling, I think, uniformly that only by unanimous consent can the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and on the objection of one Senator the unfinished business comes before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Virginia has gone too far in his statement. If the Senator had qualified his statement in this wise I would agree with him. Wherever a unanimous-consent agreement is asked to lay the unfinished business temporarily aside to consider a certain bill, and that is what I understand this request to be, at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill the unfinished business comes before the Senate. But if the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside and another bill is taken up by vote of the Senate and its consideration should not be concluded during that day, that bill becomes the unfinished business for the following day.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the reverse, if it is done by unanimous consent; but if the Senate votes to take it up it displaces the unfinished business anyway. However, when we do business by unanimous consent temporarily it terminates at any time unanimous consent is withdrawn. If, for instance, the Senator from Montana should object to the further consideration of Senate bill 4429, then the unfinished business, I understand, would come before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, however that may be, it strikes me that in this case our course is plain. The request is that the bill be laid temporarily aside for the consideration of a certain bill. If that be done, when that certain bill has been disposed of unquestionably the unfinished business automatically comes before the Senate. There is no doubt about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair agrees with the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WALSH. All the Senator from Montana desires is a ruling of the Chair. I do not want the judgment of the Chair on the matter; I want the ruling of the Chair on the point made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] as to whether when the postal bill is disposed of the water-power bill will come before the Senate without further action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I offer the following amendment which has already been agreed to——

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us adopt this amendment first.

Mr. STERLING. As I understand the situation, we have not disposed of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. I asked for a division on the amendment and I think that is pending.

Mr. POMERENE. Before the vote is taken, I wish the Senate to understand the purpose of the amendment. It is offered for one purpose only, and that is this: Often it is necessary to obtain constructive service on nonresidents. The methods for constructive service in the different States vary. In my own State, for instance, it is necessary in order to obtain constructive service upon a nonresident of the State to insert the advertisement and to mail a copy of the paper containing that advertisement to the defendant at his last known place of residence if that place of residence is known. Otherwise the fact must be stated that it is not known.

Now, if there should be no paper printed in the jurisdiction in which the suit is brought which does not contain these forbidden advertisements, under the phraseology of the pending bill a litigant would be forbidden to mail a copy of the paper to some one in another State where the law of that State forbids the carrying of a newspaper containing the advertisement, and it might embarrass legal proceedings.

So it is having that thought in mind my amendment provides that this bill not be so construed as to prevent the mailing of a copy of a newspaper when it is done for the purpose of completing service of process.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator if under its terms the advertising of a certain brand of liquor which was of any value might not be taken advantage of by bringing a bogus suit, a small suit of some sort, and then secure service in that way.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, they could only be sent to the defendant in that case.

Mr. LANE. A small suit we will say might be instituted for the purpose of securing the opportunity to advertise in a large way. If it does not have that effect, it certaintly is a good provision.

Mr. POMERENE. It certainly does not have any such effect.

Mr. LANE. They could not go on under it.

Mr. POMERENE. No.

Mr. LANE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division has been asked for. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, on which a division was asked.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, after the word "addressed" and before the period, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to make public from time to time in suitable bulletins or public notices the names of States in which it is unlawful to advertise or solicit orders for any such liquors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just one word. I was glad indeed to see this contemplated action by the Senate. It will be remembered that at the last session this proposition was pressed as an amendment on an appropriation bill, and I want to congratulate the Senator from Alabama in bringing it forward promptly and getting it before the Senate for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

IMPORTATION OF SISAL AND MANILA HEMP.

Mr. GRONNA. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to submit a report of an investigation made by a subcommittee of that committee on the importation of sisal and manila hemp. I ask that the report may be received and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed.

The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to submit a suggestion to the Senate, and I should like to have a quorum present. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hardwick	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Hughes	Nelson	Smoot
Bryan	Husting	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	James	Oliver	Sutherland
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Thomas
Clapp	Jones	Page	Thompson
Clark	Kenyon	Poindexter	Townsend
Colt	Kern	Pomerene	Vardaman
Culberson	Kirby	Robinson	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Lane	Saulsbury	Walsh
du Pont	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Williams
Fall	Lodge	Sherman	Works
Fletcher	McCumber	Simmons

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I understand it, the bill before the Senate now is what is commonly known as the Myers water-power bill. I think the public generally recognizes it by that name better than by any other. I think I am stating what is known to every Senator present when I say that there is probably as bitter opposition to this bill, as conscientious opposition to it in the Senate, as there is to the bill known as the Volunteer officers' retired list bill. I think there would be quite as much justification on the part of any Senator to oppose its consideration by every method known under the rules as there is for the opposition which has been manifested to Senate bill 392.

The Myers bill, I understand, was considered in the Democratic caucus lately and it was there decided to take that measure up as the next bill before the Senate. The Senators on the Democratic side who have expressed themselves as favorable to Senate bill 392 have told me that they felt in duty bound to abide by the instructions of the caucus.

I can not understand the attitude of any Senator who would allow himself to be bound by a caucus rule against his own conscientious conviction of what ought to be done. I have never allowed that rule to govern me, and I never expect to be governed in that manner. It, however, is a matter for the individual Senator to decide for himself as to whether he should be bound or not.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he understands that the Democratic caucus bound its members to the support of this bill or only that the bill should be taken up?

Mr. TOWNSEND. My understanding is they were bound to take up the bill for consideration and hold it before the Senate until it was disposed of.

I know from conversation with Senators that a good many of them were opposed to the action. I know that a good many of them felt that it was not proper to displace the volunteer officers' retired list bill after it had had its position before the Senate, and especially after the treatment it had received at the hands of certain Senators.

Mr. President, I hesitate to oppose by dilatory tactics a measure that a majority of the Senate sincerely desire to consider, but the fact of the matter is that the bill which was displaced by the caucus action was displaced by a majority of a majority. The minority Members on that side who are not in favor of postponing it, together with those who are friendly to it on this side, constitute a majority of the Senate. So we have this peculiar condition: A minority of the Senate through the acquiescence of minority members of the majority have agreed that the majority of the Senate shall not have its way in reference to matters of legislation. Yet Senators rise in their seats and plead that the majority shall control the legislation of the Congress. The consideration of the power bill at this time is not the voluntary desire of a majority of Senators.

Now, Mr. President, I know that if the minority on that side who are favorable to the volunteer officers' retired list bill would refuse to be bound against their better judgment, their conscientious conviction, this situation could not maintain. Nevertheless it does maintain, as I am informed; and I am also told by Senators on the Democratic side who are favorable to Senate bill 392 that they have been bound only to the consideration of the Myers bill and at the close of that bill they will vote to take up Senate bill 392.

Mr. President, if I could, if it were in my power, I should like to get that question settled in order that I may know better how to govern my action, and that other Senators on this side may govern themselves as to what course they ought to take relative to the Myers bill.

I do not know that it would be possible under the rule to get a unanimous-consent proposition even if submitted, unless the bill in reference to which the request is made is before the Senate. I think it has been determined by the Chair that I can not call for a unanimous-consent agreement to consider Senate bill 392 unless it is before the Senate. I will ask the Chair if I am correct about that. Would it—in other words, would the Chair entertain a proposal for unanimous consent to consider Senate bill 392 at the close or determination of the so-called Myers bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that such a ruling has been made and the Chair thinks it quite as important that there shall be uniformity in the rulings of the different persons who happen to preside here as that we should have rules at all. So the Chair will adhere to the ruling that the bill must be before the Senate when unanimous consent is asked.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I so understood. Before I proceed further in this matter I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392 for the purpose of getting it before the Senate in order to make some kind of an arrangement for its determination at the close of the so-called Myers bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am very much surprised that the Senator from Michigan would make that motion at this time. I understood from the remarks of the Senator from Michigan the other day—I think it was about day before yesterday when his motion to take up the volunteer officers' bill was defeated—I understood from some rather extended remarks he made at that time that he indicated he would submit to the will of the Senate as expressed by a majority vote and would make no further effort——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will say that the Senator misunderstood me. As the RECORD will disclose, I said that for that evening until I had an opportunity to discuss the matter with my colleagues I personally should not offer any further obstruction.

Mr. MYERS. It is entirely possible that I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator certainly did, and the RECORD will disclose what I have stated to be the fact.

Mr. MYERS. It is not necessary for me to look at the RECORD. If the Senator from Michigan says I misunderstood him—he knows what he said and what he meant—that is sufficient for me. I, however, had been of the impression that he was not going to press the volunteer officers' retirement bill any further until at least this bill was gotten out of the way.

I attended the Democratic caucus to which the Senator refers, and while I do not know that it is proper to state what occurred in a caucus, and I shall not undertake to do so, I am under the impression that, when the present unfinished business of the Senate is disposed of, Senators on both sides of the Chamber—those on this side of the Chamber as well as those on the other side—will be at liberty to vote to take up any measure which they may wish to take up.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Unless in the meantime another caucus should intervene.

Mr. MYERS. I am speaking of the present status of affairs according to my individual understanding. I had very much hoped, basing my hopes on what I understood the Senator from Michigan to say the other day, that we should get a fair and square chance for the consideration of House bill 408, at least for two or three days. If at the end of that time it should appear that it is going to be impossible to bring the bill to a vote, I should not consider it unreasonable to pass on to some other business; but, I repeat, the bill which is now the unfinished business has never had a fair and square chance to be brought to a vote. It has been on the calendar for about one year, and I had certainly hoped that it would get a chance for a few days at this time. The bill has not been before the Senate nearly so often nor for nearly so long a time and it has not consumed nearly so much of the time of the Senate as has the volunteer officers' bill; but, of course, I realize the right of the Senator from Michigan to make his motion at any time; and I now move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I did not yield for that purpose; I had the floor, and I supposed that I was yielding for a question.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator did not yield at all. I rose and I was recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. A point of order, Mr. President. I had not yielded the floor for the Senator to make any such motion as that. I supposed he desired to ask me a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not determine for what purpose a Senator yields the floor. The motion of the Senator from Montana is to lay upon the table the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, upon that I ask for the yeas and nays, and I give notice that there will be no haste made by that kind of a ruling or that kind of proceeding.

Mr. MYERS. I should merely like to say personally, if I may have the privilege, that I had no idea of taking the Senator from Michigan off the floor. I thought I had the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have been requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of temporary illness. I should like that announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]; and

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. DU PONT (after having voted in the negative). I have already voted, but I should like to inquire whether or not the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky. In his absence, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] is absent on account of illness. If present he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 34, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. MYERS was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr President, I think the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is exceedingly unfair and exceedingly unjust to those Members on this side of the Chamber who are with him in support of the measure upon which his heart is so deeply set. He has some friends on this side of the Chamber who are very earnestly desirous of seeing his bill enacted into law; they have on various occasions voted with him to secure the consideration of his bill by the Senate; but, Mr. President, those same Senators are likewise in favor of the bill now before the Senate as the unfinished business. It does not by any means follow, because they are in favor of the bill advocated by the Senator from Michigan, that they must at all times and under all circumstances insist upon the consideration of that bill in preference to any other measure which may in anywise come before the Senate for consideration; and when the Senator from Michigan charges upon the floor of the Senate that these friends of his measure have been coerced by any caucus action or that they are acting under any kind of duress by any caucus action or that they are in any sense guilty of any impropriety in considering that House bill 408 ought to be proceeded with before the Senate, I think the Senator ought to feel that he has not treated them quite fairly.

Mr. President, this is a Democratic Senate; the Democratic Party is responsible for the legislation which passes the Senate, and is responsible likewise for the failure of the Senate to pass any particular legislation, except in so far as it may be prevented from carrying out its will by obstructive tactics, to which the Senator from Michigan now seems determined to devote himself. It is no kind of a reflection upon the friends on this side of the Chamber of the measure advocated by the Senator from Michigan that they should express themselves as of the belief that House bill 408 ought now to be considered, instead of the bill advocated by the Senator from Michigan; nor does it imply on their part any unfaithfulness to that measure.

Mr. President, House bill 408 is intended to carry out the recommendations made by the President of the United States, in repeated messages to the Congress of the United States, urging them to enact appropriate legislation, which will permit the development and utilization of the great water-power sites of this country. The bill which is now before the Senate was prepared by a conference of the chairmen of various committees of both the Senate and the House in conjunction with the Secretary of the Interior, who, under the law, is charged with the administration of the public lands.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH. I will very gladly yield to the Senator after I get through the statement I desire to make, if he will have the kindness to indulge me so far.

Mr. WORKS. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. Having been so prepared, Mr. President, the bill had the consideration of the House of Representatives; elaborate hearings were had upon it; and it was passed by that body. It came here. The Democratic majority believed that it was a question of great importance to this country; and in the month of August last at a caucus, or conference, as it is sometimes called, which was held, it was determined at the first opportunity upon the convening of this session to urge that bill upon the consideration of the Senate. A year ago it was the unfinished business of the Senate, but had to yield to some appropriation bill which was then clamoring for consideration. When the attention of the Democratic caucus the other evening was called to the fact that this bill had already been made a caucus measure and had been considered by the Democratic majority as of such transcendent importance that it ought to have consideration immediately upon the reconvening of the present session of Congress, Democratic Members who were also favorable to the bill of the Senator from Michigan recognized that they ought to join with their associates in securing recognition of the water-power bill; and I think the Senator from Michigan will, upon considering all the conditions, absolve them from many of the charges which he has, as I think inconsiderately, made against them. I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator whether the bill that is now before the Senate is the bill that came from the conference to which he has referred or whether it has not been changed in very material and important respects?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is quite right that the bill as drafted by the conference was materially changed in the other House. It came here, and the Senate Committee on Public Lands has reported an entire substitute for it, I may say, preserving only the general aspects of the bill; and subsequently the Committee on Public Lands submitted some additional amendments to the bill. I am speaking of the history of the bill for the purpose of showing that it is an important measure, for the purpose of showing that it is identified with the efforts of the present administration to give appropriate legislation to the country, and that there is good reason why the Democratic Members in caucus assembled should have felt that they were not justified in putting upon the calendar for consideration, in preference to it, the measure advocated by a Senator on the other side; and I desire to submit that they are not open to very severe criticism, so far as I can see, for having reached that conclusion.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I did not intend to criticize the course of the Senator in what he was saying with respect to the proprieties or improprieties of what may have taken place. I only wanted to call attention to the fact that the bill now before the Senate is not the one recommepded by the President of the United States; it is not the one recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, or by the commission to which the Senator refers; but it is altogether a different bill. Of course it involves the principle that was involved in the original bill—that I confess—but it is very materially different in many respects.

Mr. WALSH. The bill that is now before us is the bill which came from the House of Representatives. The Senate committee has recommended to this body a substitute bill, which differs, as the Senator from California has said, in many essential particulars from the bill which came to us from the House. I think I have quite accurately given the history of the bill, however.

Mr. WORKS. There is no doubt about that, except that the Senator made the statement that it is the bill recommended by the commission to which he has referred. It is not the bill which came from the House; it is entirely a substitute bill, and is altogether different in its terms and in its effect.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is no use in the Senator from California and myself bandying words about this matter. I have never said that the bill was recommended by the commission or the committees to which I have referred. I have said that the bill was originally drafted in that way. It went to the House and was materially changed there. It came to the Senate and went to the Senate Committee on Public Lands, which has reported a substitute different in many essential particulars from the original bill. The fact remains, as I have said, that we have been repeatedly memorialized by the President of the United States to pass legislation upon this subject, and thus, Mr. President, it has secured an importance among the measures that are now upon our calendar for consideration that entitles it to some special attention from the Democratic Senators upon this side, even those who are in favor of the measure so earnestly advocated by the Senator from Michigan.

I have said so much only in justification of the action of the Senators who are left in such situation from the remarks of the Senator from Michigan that one would believe that they had been disciplined and were acting under some kind of mental constraint or coercion in choosing at this time that House bill 408 should be considered rather than that the bill advocated by the Senator from Michigan should have consideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I have already said, my object in making the motion to take up Senate bill 392 was to get it before the Senate in order that I might attempt to make some arrangements for considering it. Am I asking too much? But, in reference to what the Senator from Montana has stated, I desire to say that the peculiar condition grows out of the action of the caucus. What I have stated in reference to the feeling of some of the minority Members has been obtained from talking with them. I have not gone into the field of speculation in reference to this matter, but I am speaking from first-hand information. I say now, as I have said before, that I recognize that the majority has a perfect right to do what it can do properly toward enacting legislation; but when the Senator insists, as he has insisted on several occasions, that the volunteers officers' bill, Senate bill 392, has been treated fairly, he must be speaking from a thorough misunderstanding of the situation, and not at all from a familiarity with the record.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I had better, under the ruling of the Chair, refuse to yield to any Senator, and I decline to yield until I make my statement.

Mr. WALSH. I assume the Senator does not wish to make a misstatement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The motion to table the motion that I made was entertained by the Chair under these conditions: I had the floor and was making a statement. I yielded to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] for a question, as I had supposed. I did not say that I yielded for a question, because it has been taken for granted that that is what a Senator yields for; but while I had the floor the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] made a motion to table the motion I was discussing at that time. The Chair held that it was proper. Therefore, I say, while I would like to yield to the Senator from Montana, I do not wish to be put in a position where, by yielding, I surrender the floor for any purpose whatever.

I desire now to finish what I was stating. The Senator has said that this bill has been treated fairly. I understood him to say that.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator misunderstood me. I never made any such statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, what does the Senator hold as to the attitude of the majority in reference to this bill?

Mr. WALSH. I decline to make any answer to that question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, I have maintained repeatedly that the bill has not been treated fairly. If it had been, it would have been out of the way long ago. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is opposed to the bill, has repeatedly said that he was ready to vote when he made a speech upon it; that he did not believe it ought to be held up, but that there ought to be opportunity to vote on it. Other Senators have expressed themselves in the same way; but when we had it up before us for consideration for an hour or two, tactics would be employed to prevent the consideration of it, and the time of the Senate was wasted, apparently with malice aforethought. It was done for the purpose of enabling some other bill to be brought in;

and the same argument was made for it that the Senator made so eloquently just now—that it was an administration measure, and that it was therefore entitled to special consideration.

Those are the facts in reference to this bill. So, I say, I have made this motion, hoping that it may carry and that we may get consideration for it; but if the Members on the other side who favor this bill say that under no circumstances will they vote for the volunteer officers' bill or attempt to hold it before the Senate in order that a vote can be had on it in time to have it considered by the other House, then, in that case, I would not feel like unduly delaying action on the power bill, although I would be amply justified in doing so, following illustrious precedents of distinguished Democratic Senators. I am informed, however, that that is not the case; that there are Democratic Senators who are conscientiously in favor of Senate bill 392 and will vote for it if given an opportunity. Of course, that opportunity never can come if a caucus shall intervene and by it Senators shall be compelled, if they are to adhere to their party organization, to vote for some other measure.

I have not attempted to delay the deliberations of the Senate. I do not want to be put in that attitude; but I propose, under the policies that have been adopted, to use every legitimate means within my power to secure consideration of Senate bill 392. I say to you that there is no bill on the calendar against which the people would more thoroughly approve a filibuster than the bill which the Senator from Montana is now supporting. He speaks of indorsements and requests for its consideration. I, with other Senators, have received hundreds of petitions and letters protesting against its passage. But even that would not induce me to institute a filibuster to prevent a majority, after proper consideration, from voting on it. But all of these are sufficient for the majority to maintain a filibuster against the consideration of Senate bill 392 when no other matter has been pending before the Senate. The decks were cleared for it, so far as legislation was concerned; but we could not get a vote, nor could we get consideration of the bill for any considerable length of time. Something else would be interposed; and, yet, Senators rise in their places and say we ought to be fair toward these other measures; that we ought to deal justly with them.

Mr. President, we have dealt justly with them. I am prepared myself to deal justly with them now, and do not wish to interfere with the will of the majority, even if it is secured through what I regard the improper means of a secret caucus, which does, notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Montana, coerce Senators into voting in a way differently from what they would have voted if all influence had been exerted in the open Senate. The Senator himself knows that if there had been no caucus action and the question had been here upon the floor as between House bill 408 and Senate bill 392 the latter would now be the unfinished business. It required the action of a secret caucus to induce the Democratic majority of the Senate to take up House bill 408 in preference to Senate bill 392. So the fine phrases and eloquent statements of the Senator have little weight with me.

I want the majority to rule in this body. I want it to rule uncoerced, and it would have done so had not a secret caucus intervened, and every Senator knows that to be the fact. Any time when we could have had a vote upon this bill unembarrassed by any untoward circumstances we could have carried it. I could not secure that vote. I think I have been fair, and I think I have been patient, relying upon the statement of the friends of the bill that we would have a vote upon it.

I submit, Mr. President, that a vote upon this bill during the very last days of the session would not be keeping faith with the real friends of the bill. If we are going to have a vote, we ought to have it now, or soon, so that the House can have time to consider it. That is all I have asked for.

So, Mr. President, this is why I have made the motion to take up for present consideration Senate bill 392, in order that we may determine, if it is possible, to fix a day for its consideration. I am willing, even though it is unfair and unjust to ask me to do it, if such an arrangement can be made, that it shall follow the consideration of the power bill, to which I am opposed, and to which I believe the country is opposed. Maybe the country does not understand it. Maybe I do not understand it. While I say I am opposed to it now, I still have an open mind, ready to be convinced. But as the matter stands at present I could do no more popular thing in the State of Michigan, if I were courting popularity, than to oppose this bill by a resort to filibustering tactics and prevent a vote being had upon it. I repeat, however, that that has not been the course I have followed in the Senate. I have felt that after proper discussion any question that had been properly considered by a committee was entitled to its day in court.

Senators have not been willing to agree that Senate bill 392 shall receive that treatment. Those who have opposed it ask me to be fair. I have been more than fair. So, Mr. President, I have made the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392, and I trust that that motion will prevail.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I contend that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is entirely wrong in his statement of how I obtained the floor a while ago. The Senator had been speaking, and he came to a full stop and pause. I was under the impression that he had taken his seat, and I rose and addressed the Chair. I supposed, of course, he had finished his remarks. I did not ask the Senator if he would yield to me for a question, or if I might interrupt him, or if I might be heard, or ask a question, or anything of the kind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. While I was speaking, did not the Senator address his remarks to me?

Mr. MYERS. No.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is certainly mistaken about that. As all the Senators about me will understand, the Senator spoke to me, and I stopped to listen to what he might say. Then the Senator made the motion.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator said a while ago that I misunderstood him, and I credited him with full knowledge of what he said and what his intentions were; and now he has misunderstood me. I desire to make a little statement of the matter, if I may.

I say that I did not ask if the Senator from Michigan would yield to me, or if I might ask a question, or if I might interrupt him. I addressed no remark to him. If he thinks I did, he is mistaken. The Senator had come to a full pause, and stopped, and I think he took his seat. I may be mistaken about that. I was under the impression that he did.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not take my seat.

Mr. MYERS. Then I say that I thought the Senator did. The Senator came to a full pause, and stopped, in his address. I have the floor in my own right this time, and I prefer to proceed without interruption. I rose in my own right and addressed the Chair. The Chair recognized me. I proceeded to say that I was sorry the Senator from Michigan had made this motion, and gave my reasons for being sorry and for being surprised. The Chair did not ask the Senator from Michigan if he would yield to me. The Chair simply recognized me outright, without any qualification, in my own right. The Senator from Michigan imputes to me the act of rising and getting permission to interrupt him, and then taking advantage of that, having gotten the floor in that way, to move to lay his motion on the table.

If a Senator should get the floor in that way willfully, and get leave to interrupt another Senator, and, after having gotten that leave through his courtesy, should then intentionally move to table a motion, it would be a very grave act of discourtesy and of unfairness, and would be a trick to which I would not stoop nor be a party; and whatever the facts may be, I did not intend anything of the kind. I did not intend to take the Senator from the floor. I was under the impression that I had the floor in my own right, and that I was making an argument as to why we should go ahead with the consideration of House bill 408; and I was not guilty of any such act of discourtesy or unfairness or any such trick as the Senator would seem, apparently, to impute to me. I had no such intention whatever. I thought the Senator was through, and thought that I had the floor and was addressing the Chair in my own right; and I believe the RECORD will bear me out in that version of the matter.

I now ask, in order that I may be verified in that matter, that the reporter's notes of just what did transpire may be read to the Senate. I make that request. May it be granted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has sent for the reporter who took down the proceedings at that time.

Mr. MYERS. There is a great deal of difference between a Senator rising and asking leave to interrupt another Senator and getting the floor by his courtesy and then moving to take him off the floor by tabling his motion and a Senator rising in his own right and being recognized directly by the Chair and making a motion. The latter is what I thought I was doing, what I intended to do, and what I claim that I did do. I certainly had no intention nor desire of proceeding in any other way, because to proceed in any other way would be a very grave act of discourtesy and unfairness, and something which I have no desire to indulge in toward the Senator from Michigan or any other Senator on either side of this Chamber.

I see that the reporter has come in, and I ask that the notes of what transpired may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana requests that the reporter read the report of what occurred just prior to the time the Senator from Montana rose before making the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. MYERS. Beginning with the last sentence of the Senator from Michigan, and then taking up what I said and what the Chair said.

The reporter read as follows:

Mr. TOWNSEND. I so understood. Before I proceed further in this matter I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392 for the purpose of getting it before the Senate in order to make some kind of an arrangement for its determination at the close of the so-called Myers bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am very much surprised that the Senator from Michigan would make that motion at this time. I understood from the remarks of the Senator from Michigan the other day—I think it was about day before yesterday, when his motion to take up the volunter officers' bill was defeated—I understood from some rather extended remarks he made at that time that he indicated he would submit to the will of the Senate, as expressed by a majority vote, and would make no further effort——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is all the Senator desires.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the bill of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and am pledged to its support. I am also in favor of and pledged to the support of other bills of equal merit and importance. The bill which it is now sought to displace occupies a rather peculiar situation, different from most other bills that will come before the Senate. As the last session approached a close extraordinary pressure was brought to bear to bring about the consideration of numerous bills. This bill, the water-power bill, was especially pressed for consideration; and it was unanimously agreed, I think, by the steering committee and by the Democratic conference that if that bill were permitted to go over until this session it would be taken up and considered and disposed of before the Christmas holidays. When the time came for its consideration the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] was unable to attend on account of illness. He has now come here and has secured the placing of this bill upon the calendar as the unfinished business. So, as I said a moment ago, this bill occupies a little different status from that of any other bill, or at least from most other bills that will come before the Senate.

I will vote under proper circumstances to take up the bill of the Senator from Michigan, because I desire its disposition at the present session. I desire to be permitted to vote for it. But I will say to the Senator from Michigan that there is nothing in the Democratic caucus action that compels a Member to violate pledges that he has made to his constituents; and on that account I shall not feel myself bound, when the time comes when I may properly do so, to do otherwise than vote to take up his measure. I can not, however, vote to take it up to the displacement of the bill that is now before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I realize that the Senator has been friendly to the volunteer officers' bill. I have relied upon that friendship. Now, the Senator says he is in favor of it at the proper time. Does the Senator think it would be the proper time to take it up in time for consideration by the House of Representatives before Congress adjourns?

Mr. KERN. I should think so, of course. The proper time to take it up would be when effective action could be taken; but I can not say at this moment that I would vote to take it up as against some other bill that may come up immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of this bill. I will, however, deal fairly by the bill; and whenever I may do so honorably, regardless of any action of the caucus, I will vote to take up the bill of the Senator. I can not be any more specific than that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is that of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to take up Senate bill 392, commonly known as the volunteer officers' retired-list bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I make the point that no quorum is present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bryan	Fall	Husting	Kern
Clapp	Fletcher	James	Kirby
Culberson	Gallinger	Johnson, Me.	Lane
Curtis	Gronna	Johnson, S. Dak.	Lea, Tenn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The motion before the Senate is that of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to take up for consideration Senate bill 392.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the motion is to take up what bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The volunteer officers' bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The object of the motion is to lay before the Senate Senate bill 392 for the purpose of trying to make some arrangement whereby it can be considered.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not so understand the proposition.

Mr. WALSH. The object of the motion, as I understand, is to determine whether the business of the Senate is going to be regulated by the Democratic majority or by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I announce my pair and its transfer as previously. I vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the general pair I have with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Missisippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN].

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], which I transfer to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 38, as follows:

So Mr. TOWNSEND's motion was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that House bill 408 be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that the Secretary read the substitute reported by the committee, including the amendments subsequently reported.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the Senator from Montana if there is a report on the bill?

Mr. THOMAS. There are three reports.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to have the three reports read. I wish to know what they are about.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will first be read, and then the reports.

The Secretary read the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands, with the subsequent amendments reported as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed, under general regulations to be fixed by him, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or any State or Territory thereof, any part of the public lands of the United States (including Alaska), reserved or unreserved, including lands in national forests, the Grand Canyon, and Mount Olympus national monuments, and other reservations, not including national parks or military reservations, for a period of 50 years and thereafter until the property is taken over and paid for or a new lease is executed as provided in section 6 unless the applicant and the Secretary of the Interior agree on a shorter period as the applicant for lease may elect, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works necessary or convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power, which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms, as provided in section 11: Provided, That for the purpose of enabling applicants for a lease to secure the data required in connection therewith, the Secretary of the Interior may, under general regulations to be issued by him, grant preliminary permits authorizing the occupation of lands valuable for water-power development for a period not exceeding one year in any case, which time may, however, upon application, be extended by the Secretary of the Interior if the completion of the application for lease has been prevented by unusual weather conditions or by some special or peculiar cause beyond the control of the permittee: Provided, That no lease shall be granted until the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State, States, or Territory wherein said project is to be located, providing for the appropriation of water to develop or generate the electrical energy intended to be generated by applicant's proposed project.

SEC. 2. That each lease made in pursuance of this act shall provide for the diligent, orderly, and reasonable development and continuous operation of the water power, subject to market conditions.

SEC. 3. That in case of the development, generation, transmission, or use of power or energy under such a lease in a Territory, or in two or more States, the regulation and control of service and of charges for service to consumers is hereby conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

SEC. 4. That any successor in interest or assignee of any lease granted under this act, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice, the United States shall have the right upon the expiration of any lease to take over all the properties constructed, acquired, or owned by any lessee, and valuable or serviceable in the development, generation, or transmission of electric current, or in the storage or distribution of water to the point of delivery to irrigation or domestic water systems, which are dependent in whole or in part for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for, or the right to take over, upon mutual agreement with the lessee, a severable and complete unit of any such power system, upon condition that it shall pay in a lawful warrant drawn on the Treasury of the United States, or otherwise, before taking possession the fair value of such property, such value to be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the lessee, and, in case they can not agree, by proceedings instituted in the United States district court for that purpose: Provided, That such fair value shall not include or be affected by the value of any public lands, rights of way, franchises, or other property leased or granted under this act by the United States or by the good will, or prospective revenues.

SEC. 6. That in the event the United States does not exercise its right to take over, maintain, and operate the properties as provided in section 5 hereof, or does not renew the lease to the original lessee upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as may be authorized under the then existing applicable State or Federal laws, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, upon the expiration of any lease under this act, to lease the properties of the original lessee to a new lessee upon such terms, under such conditions, and for such periods as applicable State or Federal laws may then authorize, and upon the further condition that the new lessee shall pay for the properties as provided in section 5 of this act. In the event the United States does not exercise its right to take over the properties, as provided in section 5, and a renewal of the lease to the original lessee is not made, and no lease is made of the properties to a new lessee, then the lease at the option of the lessee shall continue in existence until such time as the property is taken over by the United States, as provided in section 5, or by a new lessee, as provided in section 6, or the lease is renewed: Provided, That the original lessee shall have a preference right to renewal over and above any new lessee upon such terms and conditions as the law and regulations then in force shall authorize.

SEC. 7. That where the public interest requires or justifies the execution by the lessee of contracts for the sale and delivery of electrical energy for periods extending beyond the 50-year period herein named, such contracts may be entered into upon the approval of the public-service commission or similar authority in the State in which the sale or delivery of power is made, and upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of the United States; or if sold or delivered in a Territory, or in a State which has no public-service commission, then upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; and thereafter, in the event of the termination of the lease as herein provided, the United States or any subsequent lessee shall assume and fulfill all such contracts entered into by the original lessee.

SEC. 8. That for the occupancy and use of lands and other property of the United States permitted under this act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to specify in the lease and to collect charges or rentals for all land leased, which charges or rentals shall be based on the value of the land, to be determined by the amount of horsepower to be developed, and which charge or rental shall not exceed the sum of 25 cents per developed horsepower per year for the actual power sold or used by the lessee for any purpose other than the operation of the plant, and of the proceeds 50 per cent thereof shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within which the hydroelectric energy is generated and developed. The remaining 50 per cent shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act: Provided, That leases for the development of power by municipal corporations for municipal use shall be issued without rental charge and that leases for development of power not in excess of 25 horsepower may be issued to individuals or associations for domestic, mining, or irrigation use without charge.

SEC. 9. That where the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that the value of any lands, heretofore or hereafter reserved as water-power sites or for purposes in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission, will not be materially injured for such purposes by either location, entry, or disposal, the same may be allowed under applicable land and mining laws upon the express condition that all such locations, entries, or other methods of disposal shall be subject to the sole right of the United States and its authorized lessees to enter upon, occupy, and use any part or all of such lands reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of all purposes connected with the development, generation, transmission, or utilization of power or energy, and all rights acquired in such lands shall be subject to a reservation of such sole right to the United States and its lessees, which reservation shall be expressed in the patent or other evidence of title: Provided, That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore allowed for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section contained, but nothing herein shall be construed to deny or abridge rights now granted by law to those seeking to use the public lands for purposes of irrigation or mining alone.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine books and accounts of lessees and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of water rights, lands, easements, and other property acquired, production, use, distribution, and sale of energy, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

SEC. 11. That any such lease may be forfeited and canceled, by appropriate proceedings, in a court of competent jurisdiction whenever the lessee, after reasonable notice, in writing, as prescribed in the lease, shall fail to substantially comply with the terms of this act or with such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be specifically recited in the lease.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such general rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

SEC. 13. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water.

SEC. 14. That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking or affecting any permits or valid, existing rights of way heretofore given or granted pursuant to law, but at the option of the permittee any permit heretofore given for the development, generation, transmission, or utilization of hydroelectric power may be surrendered and the permittee given a lease for the same premises under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That this act shall not apply to navigation dams or structures under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers, or to lands purchased or acquired by condemnation by the United States, or withdrawn by the President under the act approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawals of public lands in certain cases," where such lands are purchased, acquired by condemnation, or withdrawn by the President for the sole purpose of promoting navigation.

SEC. 16. That in instances where only 10 per cent or less of the lands actually necessary and required for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works for the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power in any one proposed separate, distinct, and complete plant or project are lands of the United States Government and such Government lands are to be used only for overflowage, reservoir, or transmission purposes and not in whole or in part as a dam site or the site of a power house nor for the erection of buildings or operation of machinery, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, upon application by the applicant waive such conditions, provisions, and requirements of this act as he may deem just.

SEC. 17. That authority is hereby conferred upon the State of Colorado or any citizen or citizens directly interested, or both, to institute and prosecute an action at law or in equity against the Secretary of the Interior to determine its right and the rights of its citizens to appropriate and apply to beneficial uses the waters of the Rio Grande River and its tributaries within its geographical boundaries. Such action may be instituted in the district court of the United States within the State of Colorado, and any judgment or decree therein shall be subject to review by writ of error or appeal as provided by law in other cases.

SEC. 18. That authority is hereby conferred upon the State of New Mexico, or any citizen or citizens directly interested, or both, to institute and prosecute an action at law or in equity against the Secretary of the Interior to determine its right and the rights of its citizens to appropriate and apply to beneficial uses the waters of the Rio Grande River and its tributaries within its geographical boundaries. Such action may be instituted in the district court of the United States within the State of New Mexico, and any judgment or decree therein shall be subject to review by writ of error or appeal as provided by law in other cases.

SEC. 19. That the lands leased under this act may be used and the works constructed, maintained, and operated thereon may be used, added to, or enlarged by the lessee or any other person, association, or corporation, for the purpose of impounding and conveying water for the generation and distribution of power for irrigation, mining, municipal, domestic, and other beneficial purposes, whenever such use of the water is authorized by the State wherein said project is situated, and under the authorization of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the new user shall not utilize such jointly used property to generate power, unless said lessee shall, after due notice by the Secretary of the Interior, and within a reasonable time specified by him, fail to add to or enlarge said works as herein provided: Provided, however, That if said lands and works are so used by any other than the lessee, such use must be without expense or damage to the said lessee, and that such new user shall pay to the lessee just compensation for the use of such land and works.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood one of the Senators to say that there are three reports on the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will find that two of them are what are called minority reports, one signed by two and the other by three members of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to ask before the report is read on what report the majority reported the bill that has been read?

Mr. THOMAS. The bill which has been read is the bill which was reported by the majority.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have followed the bill as it was contained in the report and it is not the bill which the Secretary read.

Mr. THOMAS. The report made by the majority of the committee was made upon the bill then reported, and it has been amended. The Senator will find the amendments printed in small capitals.

Mr. MYERS. May I make a statement in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan? Will the Senator yield to me to answer his question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I will state the facts are that on the 25th day of January, 1916, by order of the committee this bill was reported to the Senate just as it is printed in italics in the print which is on the desks of Senators. It was reported in just that way. After that report had been made the committee held further meetings on the bill to consider some questions that had arisen in the minds of some of the members of the committee and the committee considered the matter further. The committee thereafter recommended certain amendments to the bill as it had been reported out by order of the committee, 13 amendments to its own reported bill, and by order of the committee I at a later day reported those 13 amendments as committee amendments and asked that they might lie on the table.

Last summer, in July or August, when the bill was before the Senate for a few days as the unfinished business of the Senate, some Senator, I think it was the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] or the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], asked that there be made a print of the bill which should include the 13 subsequent committee amendments which had been reported from the committee in order that they might all be printed together and the amendments be put in at their proper places so as to show their relation to the context of the bill. That was done and the amendments were printed in capital letters instead of italics. The result of that print is the bill which is now on the desks of Senators, and the Secretary in reading it just read it straight through, the amendments and the text. The amendments which the committee has recommended are printed in capitals and they are not in the bill contained in the report which the Senator from Michigan holds in his hand. Those are the facts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. So we have no report on the whole bill as the Secretary has read it.

Mr. MYERS. No report has been made since the 13 amendments were reported, which were printed in the bill by order of the Senate for the convenience of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think perhaps we can get an understanding by the reading of the report. I ask for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that the majority or the minority report be read?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the reports will be read. The Secretary will first read the report of the majority of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. MYERS June 25, 1916, as follows:

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, begs leave to report it back to the Senate with an amendment, and as amended recommends that the bill do pass:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill as it appears in the report be dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not object to that. I followed the reading of the bill as it was read.

The SECRETARY. Then follows the text of the bill, and the report proceeds:

The committee regards this as one of the most important measures and one of the most beneficial and conducive to the public welfare which has been or will be considered at this session of Congress.

The object of this measure is the better and speedier development for useful and beneficial purposes of the great undeveloped water power of the country, now lagging on account of inadequate and inefficient laws. It is universally admitted that the present laws for the development of water power are lame and ineffective, and that new legislation must be had before the great and untold benefits to civilization, progress, and growth from the latent water power of the country may be had. This bill seeks to attain that result.

The bill distinctly recognizes the ownership of and the right of control in the States of the use of the waters in the flowing streams of the States. In cases where latent power is going to waste in the streams of the States and where the land adjacent thereto and necessary for the location of power sites belongs to the United States Government this measure recognizes that there must be cooperation between the States which control the water and the United States Government, which owns the land. Neither alone can successfully develop water power. There must be cooperation to attain best results, and that this bill seeks to obtain by recognizing the right of the State to the use of the water and the right of the Federal Government to the use of the land and recognizing that both are essential to development of power.

This bill in nowise seeks to encroach upon, impair, or destroy any of the rights of the States. It is not intended in any wise or in any degree to trench upon the right of the State to the control of the water flowing in the streams within its borders. It is framed upon the distinct theory that the State owns and controls the use of the water flowing within the streams within its boundaries, and that the Federal Government owns and has the right to control and dispose of the public land bordering on and adjacent to such streams. The present laws are notoriously inefficient and defective for the development of water power in streams running through public lands, and water-power development is practically paralyzed and arrested. There must be new legislation before there can be any appreciable advance in water-power development.

As to power sites where Government land adjoining streams is necessary and requisite for the construction of dams and reservoirs and the erection of plants and transmission lines (as is the case more or less with a great proportion of the available water-power sites in the Western States), the States alone can not facilitate water-power development nor provide legislation sufficient therefor, because the States control only the water. It takes land as well as water in such cases to develop power. On the other hand, the Federal Government alone can not furnish the facilities for the development of power, for the Federal Government owns only the land, and it takes water as well as land to develop power. Each must contribute its share. The Federal Government must contribute the use of the land and the State government must contribute the use of the water, and the two, working in conjunction, cooperate for the promotion of the welfare, civilization, happiness, and prosperity of the people who compose both State and Nation—the highest object of good government.

The bill expressly provides that no lease of land shall be granted by the Secretary of the Interior until the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State or Territory wherein a project is to be located, providing for the appropriation of water to develop or generate the electrical energy intended to be generated by the applicant's proposed project. In other words, the applicant for a lease must first comply with the requirements of the State laws for obtaining the right to the use of the water. The Federal Government will then grant him the right to the use of the land. Thus the two together are combined for the welfare of the public and the development of a public utility.

Extensive hearings on practically the same measure were held before the Senate Committee on Public Lands at the last session of the Sixty-third Congress, and a favorable report was made by the committee on a measure of the same nature and similar in principle. Again, at this session of the present Congress the committee has considered this measure long and maturely and amended it in some further particulars than was done at the last session of the last Congress.

The present form of the bill represents the committee's latest and most mature ideas of what water-power legislation should be.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I notice by the reading of the report that the committee regards this as the most beneficial bill which can come before us. It therefore seems to me we ought to have a quorum while the report is being read, and I suggest the absence of a quorum, very few Senators being present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Hughes	Oliver	Smoot
Bryan	Husting	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	James	Page	Stone
Chilton	Jones	Phelan	Sutherland
Clapp	Kenyon	Pittman	Swanson
Clark	Kirby	Pomerene	Thomas
Colt	Lane	Reed	Thompson
Fletcher	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Townsend
Gallinger	Lewis	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Harding	Myers	Sheppard	Walsh
Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Mich.	Williams
Hollis	Norris	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having responded to their names, the Chair announces that there is a quorum present.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am sure that no purpose is being subserved in the further reading of the report, which is available to every Senator present; and, without intending any discourtesy whatever to the Senator from Michigan, I object to its further reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made to the further reading of the report——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that the reading of a report on a bill is not in order, and that its reading can be objected to by one Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair has merely announced the objection, but has made no ruling; he has merely announced to the Senate the status, as it were, of the proceeding.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move, Mr. President, that the reading of the report be continued.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not understand that there is any rule of the Senate by which the time of the Senate can be taken up upon the request of any one Senator by the reading of a report.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I did not understand the suggestion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that I know of no rule of the Senate by which its time can be taken up in the reading of a report at the request of one Senator; and I object to the taking up of any further time in the reading of the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to inquire of my friend from Montana if he ever knew an instance when a bill was under consideration that the report thereon, upon request, was not read?

Mr. WALSH. If I consult my memory, I have in mind numbers of such instances.

Mr. GALLINGER. I never heard of it before. However, we can read the report on this side of the Chamber. My voice is in good condition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that the report of a committee upon a bill is really part of the bill as far as consideration of it is concerned. The bill must be read, and I never have heard any objection made to the reading of the report when requested by a Senator; it gives the reasons why the committee reported the bill. I have never heard, as I have stated, and state again, of an objection being made to the reading of the report on a bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I simply desire to say, in answer to the remarks of the Senator from Utah, that he is confounding terms. It is idle to talk about a report being a part of a bill. When the bill passes the report does not pass with it; it does not become a part of the law. The report is ordinarily read by unanimous consent. If I felt that the reading of the report was asked for with the view to afford any enlightenment to Members of the Senate, I should not object.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator from Montana if it was not he who, when the volunteer officers' bill was under consideration, asked that the report thereon be read?

Mr. WALSH. I have no recollection of the kind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think it was either the Senator from Montana or it was some other Senator on that side of the Chamber, at least, who asked that the report be read, and there was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. That is not at all unlikely.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to ask for a ruling of the Chair on the question, a bill having been reported and the report having been made by the same committee which reported the bill stating the reasons for the passage of the bill, whether an objection can prevent its reading?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If a ruling is asked of the present occupant of the chair, the Chair will hear any Senator who desires to be heard on the question.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely desire to ask the Senator from Montana a question. Does the Senator from Montana know of any ruling or rule of the Senate where one objection to the reading of a report will prevent its being read?

Mr. WALSH. No; we do not proceed in that way; we proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and the bill is now being considered.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. And after the bill is before the Senate and a Senator requests that the report be read, I know of no rule under which an objection from one Senator could prevent it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the fundamental rule of parliamentary law is that there must be something before the Senate for consideration; that there must be some motion before the Senate. The appropriate motion at this time touches the adoption of certain amendments which have been proposed by the committee. Those are regularly taken up in their order, according to the practice of the Senate. The pending motion is the first amendment reported by the committee.

Now, Mr. President, if any Senator wants to displace that motion and to move that we proceed to the reading of the bill, of course the majority of the Senate will determine what they wish to do about the matter; but, of course, we have got to proceed in accordance with what the majority of the Senate wants concerning the consideration of the bill. A majority of the Senate can determine that we shall proceed with the reading of the report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must know who occupies the floor. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the rules, unless by unanimous consent, a bill has to be read in full, but the formal reading of the bill can be dispensed with by unanimous consent. Then the bill is read for committee amendments. However, before a bill is read for committee amendments any Senator has the right to ask that the report of the committee be read; and that is what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has asked.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri some time since addressed the Chair, but the Chair failed to recognize him at that time. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say that, whatever the rule may be, I think this matter is foreclosed. After the reading of the bill was finished, the Senator from Michigan requested the reading of the report. That was equivalent to a motion to read the report. No objection was made at the time, and the reading has proceeded at considerable length. Consent having been given once to the reading of the report, one objection, it seems to me, can not interrupt it.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; and it could not have prevented it at the beginning, either.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it occurs to me that this is the correct view: When a bill is properly before the Senate, the regular course under the rules is to read the bill. The reading of it can be demanded or the reading of it can be dispensed with by the consent of the Senate; but I do not think that hitherto a report from a committee accompanying a bill has been regarded as having any privilege. To be sure, a Senator can ask to have it read, and, if there is any objection, he can read it himself. My view is that, inasmuch as a report merely gives the reasons which the committee assigns for the passage of a bill or the reasons which a minority may assign against the passage of a bill—statements pro and con—it is argumentative, it is in support of the measure or in opposition to it; and when the report is read it is an argument delivered by the committee, through the Secretary, orally, so to speak, to the Senate; but it is not read as a matter of right, any more than a Senator can, as a matter of right, during a debate present a book with a dozen or fifty pages marked and ask the Secretary to read it. I think that could be objected to; but, nevertheless, a Senator himself can from his place on the floor, as a part of his argument, read it. But, taking the case as it is and applying what I have said to the case as it is or to any similar case, I have not objected to the reading of the report, for the reason that, if a Senator is determined to occupy time in debate, he can read the report himself, and he will take more time in reading it, in all human probability, than would the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the Chair rules——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah permit the Chair to say that he did not intend to rule, but that the present occupant of the chair would like to say, so as to have instructions from the Senate, that his present inclination, from information through the rules, is this, that there is no power vested in the rules with which the occupant of the chair is acquainted which vests the Chair with the right to sustain an objection to a paper being read? If this be treated as a paper the reading of which is objectionable, the elements of the objection having been discovered when it was entered upon, the present occupant of the chair feels that it should be submitted to the Senate when such objection is made. Now, if there is any Senator who can point the Chair to any rule that authorizes the Chair to dispose of such a matter by a ruling of the Chair, of course he will be grateful for the information.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to point the Chair to a ruling made on January 16, 1915, which I read, as follows:

JANUARY 6, 1915 (63D CONG., 3D SESS.).

The shipping bill being under consideration, Mr. LODGE asked for the reading of the report of the committee on the bill.

An objection to the reading of the report was made by Mr. SMOOT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas). The Senator from Utah objects. The question is, then, Shall the report be read? The Chair is doubtful as to whether it is not the right of an individual Senator to have the report read, and the Chair is going to rule that a report must be read on the request of any Senator. It seems that that will be the way to present the matter definitely and fairly to the Senate. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1061–1062.)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the question seems to be answered plainly by Rule XI, which is perfectly clear in its terms, and which reads:

When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

Mr. SMOOT. But this is not "a paper" in that sense.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Montana seriously hold to the view that a report from a committee is in the ordinary sense "a paper"?

Mr. WALSH. I can not conceive a definition of a paper that would not include it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. The bill also is "a paper," then?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Equally so?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Could the Senator have objected to the reading of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. No; because the rule expressly provides that the bill shall be read; and so that does not fall within the rule to which I have just referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. That rule has always been applied to the submission of newspaper articles and other papers; and, if objection is made, the question is submitted to the Senate; but surely a report from a committee is not "a paper" within the meaning of that rule.

Mr. WALSH. I do not see why it is not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, I could not persuade the Senator if I should make a speech on the subject.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. Just a moment. I have watched proceedings in this body for a long while, and I think the only time I ever knew a suggestion to be made that the reading of a report could be objected to was made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]——

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is the only case.

Mr. GALLINGER. And he astounded me when he made it a little time ago. I know of no other instance. The then President pro tempore of the Senate overruled that objection, and ruled that a demand for the reading of a report was in order, and that the report should be read.

Why, Mr. President, we are considering a bill the reasons for which are set forth in the report, and to say that we should not have the privilege of knowing what those reasons are and not have the report read is astounding to me.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, for whom I have the very highest respect, if he would like to have the report read for his enlightment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not made that request. The Senator from Michigan has made the request, and I think he is entirely within his rights to have the report read; and, inasmuch as the Senator from Montana will freely confess that the Senator from Michigan can read it, or I can read it, or any other Senator can read it, I do not see what is gained by this contention. We have lost 15 or 20 minutes already.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. It is true that Rule XI provides, as the Senator from Montana has just said, that—

When the reading of a paper is called for and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

But it refers us to Jefferson's Manual, section 32, which reads as follows:

SEC. 32. READING PAPERS.

Where papers are laid before the House or referred to a committee, every Member has a right to have them once read at the table before he can be compelled to vote on them; but it is a great though common error to suppose that he has a right, toties quoties, to have acts, journals, accounts, or papers on the table read independently of the will of the House. The delay and interruption which this might be made to produce evince the impossibility of the existence of such a right. There is, indeed, so manifest a propriety of permitting every Member to have as much information as possible on every question on which he is to vote that when he desires the reading, if it be seen that it is really for information and not for delay, the Speaker directs it to be read without putting a question, if no one objects; but if objected to a question must be put. (2 Hats., 117, 118.) (Note.—See Senate Rule XI.)

I simply call the Chair's attention to the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have only to add—and I do it in all good faith—that I trust the Senator from Montana will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have already addressed an inquiry to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and I shall be glad to tender the same question also to include the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] in my inquiry, and ask if they think they really desire this report to be read for their enlightenment?

Mr. GALLINGER. If I were in the place of the Senator from Michigan I would say to the Senator from Montana that it is not his privilege to interrogate me as to why I want a report read. That would be my reply.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from New Hampshire is appealing to me not to make this objection, and I am saying to the Senator that if he really and sincerely desires the report read for his enlightenment I will take his word for it, and I shall withdraw the objection. I will say to the Senator from Michigan while I am on my feet that if he will rise in his place and say that he desires this report read for his enlightenment I will not object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know whether the report would enlighten me or not. I have not read it; I have not had time to read it; I should like to hear it read; but

I am afraid it will not enlighten me much. That is my opinion, stated offhand; but possibly it might persuade me to vote for this bill. I do not know whether or not I shall vote for it; but I still insist, Mr. President, that there are certain rights that individual Senators can not be deprived of. The entire history of our legislation here is against the position the Senator from Montana takes, and he can find no precedent that will sustain him in that position. So I do appeal to him to let us go along in an orderly way.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, nothing is more apparent at this moment than that this is a mere attempt to consume the time of the Senate in order, if possible, by the consumption of time, to create a condition——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what is being accomplished now.

Mr. REED. I did not understand the Senator's remark.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested that that is what is being accomplished now.

Mr. REED. Yes. Of course, when the wise and great Senator from New Hampshire rises there is no consumption of time, because there is nothing but a shower of intellectual blessings being poured on the earth.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have never made an observation of that kind concerning the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator certainly made it at this moment, when he said that I was consuming time.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I did not say that. I said that the objection made by the Senator from Montana, which has resulted in a controversy, has consumed time.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to mean to make the personal remark that I was consuming time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not.

Mr. REED. If he did not so mean the remark, I withdraw my remark.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad the Senator does, because I do not claim to have the wonderful gift that the Senator accords to me, and I should be sorry to have it attached to my name in any form.

Mr. REED. The remark made by the Senator was certainly susceptible of the construction that I gave it. If the Senator did not mean that construction, I certainly desire to make no unpleasant remark regarding him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I disclaim having meant it in that way.

Mr. REED. So let the matter rest.

What I rose to say when I was interrupted was that it is perfectly manifest at this moment, and has been manifest for days, that there is a fixed purpose to consume time with the bill brought forward by the Senator from Michigan, to such an extent as to force the majority to permit the passage of that bill in order to take care of the necessary business of the session.

I understood the Senator from Michigan on yesterday, or the day before, to say that he had tested the disposition of the Senate in regard to his bill, and had found out that the disposition was not to pass the bill, and therefore that he did not intend to obstruct the public business by bringing it forward any further. I understood that to be the tenor of his remarks. I thought at the time it was a very proper and statesmanlike view to take.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not seen the RECORD, but I have a clear recollection of what I did say. I said at that time that "that evening" I did not propose further to use any obstructive tactics until I had had an opportunity to talk with other friends of the bill in reference to the matter; but I will say to the Senator that now I am asking for consideration of this report. It is the most information that we have on the subject; and, to start out with, it states it is one of the most important bills that can be brought up. I have asked that this report be read, and I propose that it shall be laid before the Senate and be printed in the RECORD in order that the thousands of people who read that RECORD may know at least what the reasons given by the Committee on Public Lands for the enactment of the bill are, and what are those given in opposition to it.

Mr. REED. Well, "the fool, though a wayfaring man," will have no difficulty in locating either the disposition or the purposes of the Senator from Michigan. It is part of the obstructive tactics which he now states he did not say he would abandon, but that he said he would abandon them temporarily until he had had time to consult. I assume he has had time to consult, and has concluded to renew them.

Mr. President, in a situation of this kind there is nothing to be gained by appealing to Senators along the line of generosity or along the line of getting on with the public business. The situation that is being rapidly developed is that there is being manifested a fixed purpose to obstruct the business of this session. Whether or not that is the purpose, that is the effect of what is being done. There are considerably less than 60 days left of this session. The appropriation bills and probably a revenue bill must be passed. There is much other important legislation. I hope the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber will not make it necessary for us to begin holding night sessions in the very near future—a thing that is always undesirable and always unpleasant, but will be made absolutely necessary in the very near future.

I think it might as well be understood that the majority do not intend to be coerced into taking up the Senator's bill until they think a proper time has come to take it up, and that every effort that is being made now to obstruct the business of the Senate in order to force the majority to accept that bill is much more likely to defeat the bill ultimately than if tactics of a different kind were being pursued. I do not say that to criticize the Senator. He has pursued his own course; but it is perfectly plain that we can not afford to spend much more time in this way if we are to get through with the business of the Senate that must be done at this session. Therefore, I am urging that we come to a plain understanding of the matter.

Time and again votes have been cast here that have indicated that the majority intend to take up and consider at this time the water-power bill, and that they do not intend to take up the retirement bill at this time. Now, why not get on with the water-power bill? Why make it necessary for us to begin, first, with having sessions starting at 10 o'clock in the morning and perhaps make it necessary to have sessions lasting all night?

I hope these tactics will not be pursued.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I find no fault with the criticism of the Senator from Missouri; but I want to remind the Senator from Missouri that during the last session of Congress we passed legislation which was very important, and which was perhaps more important to his section of the country than it is to mine. We passed here a bill appropriating $15,000,000 for the manufacture of nitrogen. That bill was amended so as to make it $20,000,000. Now, the Government of the United States is to invest $20,000,000 in the manufacture of nitrogen; and is it fair to say that we who are opposed to giving away the resources of the country are filibustering when we say that we want to discuss these measures? The Senator from Missouri realizes, of course, the importance and the value of water power in the manufacture of nitrogen.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. REED. I have passed no criticism on any man for wanting to discuss the water-power bill. That is what I desire—that it shall be taken up and discussed; that the time of the Senate shall not be taken up with the useless reading of reports, but that we may have the benefit of full discussion; that we may have the views of the Senator who now has the floor and others, and vote.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Missouri—and I do it in all seriousness—whether he believes that a report written by the great Committee on Public Lands, and touching directly upon this question of water power, would be a useless report? It seems to me it would be a very important document to the Senate and would enlighten many of us.

Mr. REED. Of course I assume that the report is an able document. I have not read it; but every Senator here can take it and read it in his office or read it at night. Indeed, we all ought to have read it long ago. The reading of a document of this kind from the desk enlightens nobody. Nobody listens to it. Nobody pays any attention to it. The fact is that it could be read to-night by the Senator, and read much more effectively than he can listen to it. Now, of course, if the Senator is so set against the water-power bill that he wants to consume all the time possible, that is a different proposition. I have not assumed that he did. I do not assume it now.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have not consumed any time either for or against the water-power bill. I do not say that I am against the water-power bill in all its provisions; but I want to say to the Senator from Missouri and to the Senate that I am deeply interested in this kind of legislation, and that I am opposed to any provision that will take these great water powers and give them to individuals and then compel the Government of the United States to pay any price that may be asked.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I want to say to the Senator that this bill does not do anything of that kind. If the Senator will read it carefully, he will see that it gives nothing away.

Mr. GRONNA. Why, then, should we not have a right to ask for the reading of the report, and find out what the bill does contain?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am not arguing that matter. The Senator seemed to infer that this bill gave away something. I just wanted to enlighten him on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the bill give this power to municipalities without cost?

Mr. MYERS. It gives municipalities a preferential right.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It gives it to them without cost.

Mr. MYERS. It gives them a preferential right to a lease where they apply with others; and while it has been quite a long time since I read the bill, if the bill provides that it does give any rights to municipalities, it is giving them to the people, and not to individuals.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Undoubtedly; but the Senator said it is not giving away these rights. It is giving them to municipalities without charge.

Mr. MYERS. I said, I think, that it did not give away any rights to individuals.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If my friend from North Dakota will permit me, the contention is over the reading of these reports. The contemporaneous history of this legislation is the only record that is made here, taken down by the reporters, and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It seems to me there could be no more appropriate place for the careful, deliberate, painstaking conclusions of the committee having the matter in charge than to have their views read before the Senate. I have listened to these reports with a great deal of interest and have often been convinced by them.

Mr. MYERS. I am not contending over that. I just wanted to make a statement on another phase of what the Senator from North Dakota said.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not refer to the passage of a bill appropriating $20,000,000 for the purpose of manufacturing nitrogen in any spirit of criticism. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I favored that report. I signed that report myself. I was in favor of that legislation, and for that reason I think I have a right to ask for some enlightenment upon this bill; and I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota that he really wants the report read for his enlightenment, I withdraw my objection to the further reading of the report.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana thinks that I am the only Member of the Senate who would be enlightened by this report, perhaps it would be asking more than I am entitled to. I do not ask for it simply to enlighten me.

Mr. WALSH. By no means, Mr. President. If there is one Senator on this floor who wants the report read for his enlightenment, I do not intend that he shall be denied the opportunity.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that I not only want this report read, but I assure the Senator from Missouri that before this bill passes it will be discussed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I think this report ought to be read, although perhaps not for the sake of enlightening individual Senators, because some of us, at least, know very well what is in both the minority and the majority reports. As is said in the report itself, this is one of the most important questions that will come before this Congress, perhaps the most important of all to certain sections of this country. The committee, as a committee and as individual members of the committee, have given a tremendous amount of work and study to the consideration of this bill. That work and study and its results ought to be of record, because the discussion of this bill is no less important than the discussion of the land legislation 60 or 70 years ago, which provoked, perhaps, the most noted debate that was ever had in the Senate of the United States. I think the record ought to be made up. I think it should all appear in the RECORD, both the discussion and the reports of the committee, and it is well worth preserving. Unless it be read it can not well be preserved in the RECORD. It could, of course, be preserved by having it published in the RECORD by unanimous consent, but that does not appear to be the method of proceeding this afternoon.

Therefore it seems to me the report should be read, in view of the importance of the bill and in view of the importance of the questions involved. Those who have not considered this bill have little realization of the importance of the questions involved. The rights of the States, the rights of the municipalities, the power of the General Government over the States, the power of the General Government and the power of the States over the control of waters within the States—all these things are questions fundamental in their character. The reports of both the majority and the minority of the committee are exhaustive both upon the facts of the situation and upon the law and they ought to be preserved in the RECORD. It seems to me the quickest way to do it is to have it read into the RECORD as is proposed now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the matter now before the Senate, the Senator from Montana having made the objection, and upon a subsequent colloquy between himself and the Senator from North Dakota having withdrawn the objection, the objection is not now before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the reading of the report is proceeded with I trust I shall have the indulgence of the Senate until I say that I regret very much any effort thus early in the discussion of this bill to prejudice it in advance by any declaration of opposition to "giving away the great natural resources of the Government." I trust that we will take up this bill and consider it and at the proper time and place urge whatever objections we have to the bill as a whole or to any particular features of it.

The Senator from North Dakota will recall that when the Shields bill, so called, was before the Senate for consideration I voiced some very emphatic disapprobation of many important features of that bill and I think those features of it which have provoked much criticism since the last session of Congress. In my own estimation the criticism was deserved. Different people have different ideas about it. I recall very well that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] voted with me upon most of the amendments that I suggested to that measure. That is my recollection about the matter at least.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Montana does not wish, I am sure, to put me in a false light. I voted against the Shields bill.

Mr. WALSH. Why, certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. And I think the Senator from Montana voted for it?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana has not asserted that the Senator from North Dakota voted for the Shields bill. The Senator from Montana who now has the floor declares now that he voiced, again and again, on the floor in the discussion of that bill his disapprobation of many features of the bill and suggested many amendments to the bill, the Senator from North Dakota, as my recollection is now, joining me in an effort to amend the bill to conform to our own ideas. So the ideas of the Senator from North Dakota and my own concerning water-power legislation were very much alike last summer.

The Senator will likewise remember that when the bill was up before the Senate upon its final passage I stated that I was opposed to the bill in that form, and that I voted for it only because I knew perfectly well that it never could pass the House in that form. The information that I gave to the Senate at that time proved to be entirely accurate.

Now, I trust the Senator will enter into the consideration of this measure in the same spirit and let us go to work and see if we can not frame a bill which will permit the development of these great resources and at the same time not give them away to those who desire to rob the public.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in order that the Senator from Montana and I may understand each other, I want to assure the Senator from Montana that I am not against water-power legislation. I believe something should be done to permit the development of water power; but I believe it should be done with the utmost care, and I do not believe we should extend the leases through these long periods of time, because where these water powers are upon Government lands the Government can now control them; and I do not believe that the Congress of the United States has any right to throw away these valuable water powers.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire of the Senator if he understands that this bill does that?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not say that this bill does that, but I do say that the Government should at least reserve the right to operate some of these water powers for its own industries, because we have already said by legislation that the Government of the United States shall go into the business of manufacturing nitrogen, and we have appropriated $20,000,000 for that purpose; and every sensible man knows that we can not manufacture nitrogen without power, and that the cheapest power that we can get is water power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report is now before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, before continuing the reading of the report I desire to state that I feel it is very important to read these reports. It has been confessed that this in one of the most important measures before Congress. It has been admitted by the committee that it has been very careful in its consideration of the measure, and it has set forth its views in these reports. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] intimated that we had better proceed to the discussion rather than to read the reports, because nobody listened to the reports. I will ask the Senator how many listen to the discussion? Very seldom is there a majority in the Senate when a Senator is speaking. But this report can be read, and Senators will have an opportunity, if they wish, to listen to the views of the committee and those of the minority members who opposed the bill.

Furthermore, this is a bill which displaces the House bill, and substitutes a new measure for it; and the committee are setting forth their views for that substitution. I desire that those views shall be read, together with the opinion of those gentlemen who have been considered authority on the subject which the committee has quoted from, and the law on that subject which the committee thought was important enough to put into the record. On other occasions, when other bills have been up, Senators have insisted that the report should be read. Nobody objected to that. I am glad the Senator has withdrawn his objection now, and that we can proceed in an orderly manner with the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, as follows:

The principle is the same as that embodied in the bill as passed by the House at this session. The principle is in nowise changed, but the Senate committee has reconstructed it and made a good many changes which it is believed are distinctly for its betterment and improvement, and which are calculated to make it a more feasible and workable law.

Millions upon millions of available water horsepower are annually running to waste in this country for want of utilization on account of the lack of proper laws. This waste of power each year is gone, never to become available. Meantime, the people of our country are making great inroads upon the Nation's supply of coal which can never be replaced. The utilization of this wasted water power, which is inexhaustible and does not diminish by use, would add inestimably to the comforts of life and the promotion of the public welfare, would lower the cost of living, and would reserve for other uses and for future generations our supply of coal. This measure, if enacted into law, of course, would apply only to the public-land States of the Union.

Reliable authorities estimate about 61,000,000 water horsepower in the United States. The total available water power of all countries of Europe is 35,965,000 horsepower. The United States Geological Survey estimates that 44,049,000 horsepower, or 71 per cent of the total potential available horsepower in the United States, is contained in the principal public-land States, and of this amount less than 2,000,000 horsepower is now being utilized, which shows a frightful waste from neglect and lack of proper legislation.

Electricity is one of the great potent factors of the universe. Electrical development is probably making greater strides than any other branch of science or adjunct of civilization. Therefore, it is worthy of careful attention and sound legislation in the interest of the public. Three great fields in the development of this country await the magic touch of electrical power for wonderful results and untold benefits. They are:

1. The use of pumping plants for putting water on arid lands for irrigational purposes.
2. The electrification of railroads.
3. The production of fertilizers, explosives, and electrochemicals.

The use of electrical power in each is intensely needed. Such use would supply widespread wants, increase tremendously our agricultural products, lower the cost of living, facilitate transportation, and assist in the national defense and preparedness against foreign encroachments. The benefits of electrical development are too many and great to be mentioned in this report. It is sufficient to say that they are conceded by all and it is believed by the committee that this bill provides the best means for the encouragement thereof, where portions of the public domain are necessary therefor.

This measure, if enacted into law, would not only benefit the people as individuals but would add to the taxable assets of the various States. The right of occupancy of the public domain, together with improvements thereon, is taxable by the State. It is so held in Forbes v. Gracey (94 U. S., 762). Elder v. Wood (208 U. S., 226), and other decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The question of the constitutional power of the United States to lease its lands for a limited period of time has been settled in the affirmative by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Gratiot (14 Pet., 526), Light v. United States (220 U. S., 523), and other cases. On this subject a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary of the Sixty-second Congress, by resolution of the Senate, made an extensive and valuable report, to which reference is here made, holding emphatically that the United States Government has undoubtedly such power and right, and the report is enriched with many citations and much reasoning.

Prior to February 15, 1901, there was no legislation at all on the subject of water-power sites on Government land. Prior to that time water-power sites went to patent unnoticed. About that time public sentiment began to be aroused as to the importance of water-power development on the public domain, and the act of February 15, 1901, known as the revocable-permit law, was enacted, and later there was enacted an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill of March 4, 1911, relating to rights of way over forest reservations. They but blazed the way for suitable legislation. They furnish but little encouragement to water-power development and have become unsuited to the demands of the times. What is needed now is legislation that will be safe for and attractive to capital and just to the people. Capital is entitled to a fair rate of interest, and the people are entitled to good service at a reasonable price.

The two acts above referred to are here set forth:

[Act of Feb. 15, 1901, the revocable-permit law, an act relating to rights of way through certain parks, reservations, and other public lands.]

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him, to permit the use of rights of way through the public lands, forest and other reservations of the United States, and the Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks, Cal., for electrical plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electrical power, and for telephone and telegraph purposes, and for canals, ditches, pipes and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, or other water conduits, and for water plants, dams, and reservoirs used to promote irrigation or mining or quarrying, or the manufacturing or cutting of timber or lumber, or the supplying of water for domestic, public, or any other beneficial uses to the extent of the ground occupied by such canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, reservoirs, or other water conduits or water plants, or electrical or other works permitted hereunder, and not to exceed 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof, or not to exceed 50 feet on each side of the center line of such pipes and pipe lines, electrical, telegraph, and telephone lines and poles, by any citizen, association, or corporation of the United States, where it is intended by such to exercise the use permitted hereunder or any one or more of the purposes herein named: Provided, That such permits shall be allowed within or through any of said parks or any forest, military, Indian, or other reservation only upon the approval of the chief officer of the department under whose supervision such park or reservation falls and upon a finding by him that the same is not incompatible with the public interest: Provided further, That all permits given hereunder for telegraph and telephone purposes shall be subject to the provision of title 65 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and amendments thereto, regulating rights of way for telegraph companies over the public domain: And provided further, That any permission given by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successor in his discretion, and shall not be held to confer any right, or easement, or interest in, to, or over any public land, reservation, or park.

"Approved, February 15, 1901."

[Act of Mar. 4, 1911 (36 Stat., 1253), being an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill.]

"That the head of the department having jurisdiction over the lands be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him, to grant an easement for rights of way, for a period not exceeding 50 years from the date of the issuance of such grant, over, across, and upon the public lands, national forests, and reservations of the United States for electrical poles and lines for the transmission and distribution of electrical power, and for poles and lines for telephone and telegraph purposes, to the extent of 20 feet on each side of the center line of such electrical, telephone, and telegraph lines and poles, to any citizen, association, or corporation of the United States, where it is intended by such to exercise the right of way herein granted for any one or more of the purposes herein named: Provided, That such right of way shall be allowed within or through any national park, national forest, military, Indian, or any other reservation only upon the approval of the chief officer of the department under whose supervision or control such reservation falls, and upon a finding by him that the same is not incompatible with the public interest: Provided, That all or any part of such right of way may be forfeited and annulled by declaration of the head of the department having jurisdiction over the lands for nonuse for a period of two years or for abandonment.

"That any citizen, association, or corporation of the United States to whom there has heretofore been issued a permit for any of the purposes specified herein under any existing law, may obtain the benefit of this act upon the same terms and conditions as shall be required of citizens, associations, or corporations hereafter making application under the provisions of this statute."

A feature of this bill which recognizes both State and Federal jurisdiction within the proper sphere of each is that which provides that all interstate business in connection with this subject shall be under the control and supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission and leaving to the respective States the regulation of intrastate business.

Brief comment will be made by way of calling attention to the principal provisions of the bill in the various sections thereof.

The first section provides for the leasing of lands. The term of lease is made 50 years, unless the applicant may desire a shorter lease and the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to grant it. After exhaustive hearings, at which were heard the views of capitalists, representatives of bondholders, water-power investors, utility experts, representatives of the Government, and others, it is believed by the committee that a lease of 50 years is most suitable to the needs of legislation and is fair to all. The principal water-power investors heard agreed that it would be fairly satisfactory to them, and it is believed that it is in accord with the interests of the public. There must be some stated tenure of title. It takes time to establish on a paying basis plants for the generation of hydroelectrical power, and thereafter the investor is entitled to sufficient time in which to recoup his losses and average a fair profit on his investment from the beginning. It is believed that 50 years is a sufficient time in any reasonable case in which to do so. This section further provides that the applicant for a lease must first comply with the requirements of the laws of the State or Territory providing for the appropriation of water to develop and generate electrical energy, thus recognizing the exclusive right of the State to the control of the water.

Section 2 provides for diligent work upon and continuous operation of the plant, and section 3 places the control of service and charges for service in interstate transmission and business in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Section 5 contains the recapture clause, and provides that at the expiration of a lease, upon not less than three years' notice, the United States may take over all the properties of the plant which are dependent in whole or in part for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease, which may have been acquired under the provisions of the act, or may take over, upon mutual agreement with the lessee, any severable and complete unit of any system, upon paying compensation therefor, as set forth in the section. This is intended to preserve to the people the right of taking over and owning plants, if they may see fit.

Section 6 provides for renewing the lease, at the expiration of its life, upon the same or different terms, to the same or another lessee, and for continuous operation. It gives the original lessee a preferential right.

Section 7 provides, upon certain conditions, for the making by the lessee of contracts to supply power beyond the life of the lease, in certain cases, but not for more than 25 years, in any event, beyond the life of the lease.

Section 8 provides for the payment of compensation by the lessee for the use of the land leased. It may be graduated according to the profitableness of the lease of the land. It provides that 50 per cent of all revenue received from leases shall be by the Secretary of the Treasury paid each year directly to the State in which the plant may be located, to be the property of the State and with which it may do as it may please. The remaining 50 per cent must be paid into and used for the reclamation fund for reclamation projects in the arid States. Thus, all of the money derived, the entire proceeds, without any reservation, must go to the States. The Federal Government is to retain no profit or revenue for the use of its lands.

Section 9 provides for surface entries, in such manner as not to interfere with the development of power projects, on public lands reserved as water-power sites or for purposes in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission.

Section 10 provides for Government inspection of books and accounts of lessees, necessary statements, and reports.

Section 11 provides methods and means by which the lease may be forfeited, when proper that it should be.

Section 12 provides for necessary and proper rules and regulations by the Secretary of the Interior, and section 13 expressly recognizes and concedes the sovereign right of the State to the control, appropriation, use, and distribution of water within its borders.

Section 14 protects and keeps valid existing permits and provides that permittees may come under the provisions of this act, if they may so elect.

Section 15 provides that this act shall not apply to navigation dams or structures under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or Chief of Engineers, or lands acquired or withdrawn for the sole purposes of permitting navigation.

Section 16 provides that in instances where only 10 per cent, or less, of lands actually necessary and required for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams, conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works for the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of power in any plant or project are lands of the United States, and such public lands are to be used only for overflowage, reservoir, or transmission purposes, and not in whole or any part as a dam site or the site of a power house nor for the erection of buildings or the operation of machinery, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, lease such public lands for not more than 50 years, at such price and upon such terms as he may deem just, and free from all or any of the other terms and requirements of this act, as he may see fit. This is intended to exempt from the workings and requirements of this act, as the Secretary of the Interior may elect and if he may see fit, projects where only a negligible and inconsequential percentage of the land required may be public land. It is thought that in some instances great and beneficial projects may be established and put into operation where only a trifle of public land will be used for overflowage or transmission, where water may back up over a few acres of Government land or a transmission line may merely run across a corner of a section of Government land, and that in such cases it might not always be wise or just to subject the project to all of the requirements, substantial and minor, of this act. In such cases, the Secretary of the Interior may use his discretion in bringing such a project under all or any of the provisions of this act. There might be cases where it would hardly be fair to require the lessee to pay for the use of a trifling area of public land in accordance with the amount of his profits and subject him to an inspection of his books and accounts. In that event the Secretary could lease a small area of public land for 50 years, at a flat rental. It is wholly discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This report does not quite harmonize with the reported bill. The report says that these leases should be made at a flat rental. Is it left to the Secretary of the Interior to determine that amount?

Mr. MYERS. I explained an apparent discrepancy between the report and the bill to the Senator's colleague the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] a while ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Unfortunately, I have not had an opportunity to confer with my colleague.

Mr. MYERS. I explained that discrepancy. It is owing, I will say, to the committee having brought in some subsequent amendments to its own report after the report was made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator, and that may have been a very good reason for not reading the report. It is the best reason I have heard advanced.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will permit me, I am not objecting to the reading of the report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand.

Mr. MYERS. I am merely answering the question the Senator asked.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I interrupt the reading to ask the Senator from Montana to be kind enough to explain that part of the report which refers to section 8 of the bill? I refer to the language on page 9 of the report, which states:

> Section 8 provides for the payment of compensation by the lessee for the use of the land leased. It may be graduated according to the profitableness of the lease of the land.

How is the profitableness of the leasing of the land to be determined in advance?

Mr. MYERS. By the amount of horsepower developed. He would have to provide that if a certain amount of horsepower were developed the charge would be so much; if so much more horsepower were developed, it would be so much more—a sliding scale.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, the basis shall be the value of the land.

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not the value of the power developed.

Mr. MYERS. As determined by how much the land in conjunction with the water flowing past it may yield in horsepower. Some land with water flowing by might yield very little horsepower and therefore a very small charge would be made. Other land with water flowing by might yield a very large amount of horsepower and therefore more should be charged. I think that was the idea of the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to assure the Senator from Montana that my question was asked in all seriousness, because I find myself suddenly connected with water-power legislation with respect to problems existing in the State of New York.

Mr. MYERS. I never doubted at all the seriousness of the Senator's question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The point I wanted to make is this: Does the committee in its report on the bill request the Secretary of the Interior to fix the annual rental based upon the amount of water power which can be generated at the site or does it ask the Secretary of the Interior to take into consideration the facilities for disposing of and selling that water power after its development as a proper element in fixing the value of the rent? The horsepower may be much more valuable in one portion of the country than in another.

Mr. MYERS. The language is "shall be based on the value of the land, to be determined by the amount of horsepower to be developed." I think the idea of the committee, as I recollect the discussion in the committee meetings, was to grade it according to the amount of power developed; if so much were developed, so much to be charged; if more was developed, then more to be charged. There would have to be a sliding scale of charges.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No matter what the market for the horsepower may be?

Mr. MYERS. This is the idea. I do not see what the market has to do with it. If the party engaged in the business, the leaseholder, develops a thousand horsepower he is to pay so much. If he develops 2,000 or 5,000 horsepower he is to pay so much more. He is to pay according to the amount of horsepower that he develops. He does not have to develop it unless he finds a market for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply desire to point out what I believe to be an economic fallacy in reaching the value by that method. Suppose the Government owned a block in the center of the city of New York and an equal area of land on a western prairie, would we pass a law in Congress fixing the rental value of those two tracts of land according to the cubic contents of the houses that might be erected upon them?

Mr. MYERS. No, sir; but according to the profitableness of the area, how much profit the leaseholder was making out of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the very point I raise. The suggestion of the committee is not based upon the profit to be derived from the generation of horsepower, but simply on the number of horsepower generated.

Mr. MYERS. It is presumed that the leaseholder would not develop a power and sell it unless he were making profit out of it. If he does, it is his own fault.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is to be determined after he has completed the construction and developed the power.

Mr. MYERS. He takes that risk. If he wants to develop a thousand horsepower, he understands in advance that he has to pay so much, and he is not presumed to develop it unless he knows he has a profitable market for it. He is supposed to be a man of ordinary intelligence and to understand his own business.

If he develops 5,000 horsepower, it is assumed that by developing it he knows where he is going to dispose of it and do it profitably, and he must pay so much more. That, I am sure, was the idea of the committee, as I remember the discussions in the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply desire to call attention to the fact that, of course, there will be of necessity varying degrees of profit in the sale of electric power.

Mr. MYERS. That is undeniable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No matter what the varying degrees of profit to the corporation, the Government will receive no different compensation.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; a man does not have to develop power unless he is going to make a profit out of it. If he makes a profit out of it he pays, whether he does or not, according to the amount of horsepower developed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Government, as I understand, can not exceed in any event a charge of 25 cents per developed horsepower per year.

Mr. MYERS. That is true. That limitation was put in because the committee felt that the consumer would have to pay the cost in the end, and we wanted to make it as light on the consumer as possible.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New York that in many cases power generated under the provisions of this bill, if it ever becomes law, will be sold at $22 per horsepower per year, and there are many other cases where it will be sold for $72 per horsepower per year. The bill, as the Senator says, makes no difference whatever in the charge of two contracts that may be entered into, one at $22 per horsepower per year and the other at $72 per horsepower per year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Utah if he would regard it as at all practicable—and in asking the question I confess myself an amateur on the subject—to fix the compensation coming to the Government on a percentage basis, a percentage of the profits on the price charged by the corporation for the horsepower?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as no doubt the Senator knows, I am opposed to the bill. What ought to be done, I think, is to allow the States themselves to control the distribution and the charge of power through the public-utility corporations of the State, and yet keep control of it in a way by the Government, after the plan provided for in my bill, which I intend to offer as a substitute for the bill under consideration. The pending bill affects waters that rise in a State, that never flow out of a State, and which unquestionably belong to the State; and yet under this bill they are to be controlled and a charge is to be made for every horsepower developed by the Government. Therefore, I say to the Senator very frankly that I am opposed to the bill in its present form.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that the limitation of 25 cents per horsepower does not meet my approval, and I trust that he will not get an unfavorable opinion of the general principles of the bill until after we see whether or not we can remove that limitation. I should be very glad to join the Senator in removing it.

Likewise, I wish the Senator would not really definitely make up his mind about the basis upon which the compensation to the Government should come until we take the judgment of the Senate concerning that matter, for I likewise agree with the Senator that the value of the land as determined by the profitableness of the enterprise is rather an obscure basis, to say the least. All these things, I am very sure, will receive earnest attention as we proceed with the consideration of the bill. I am very sure that the general ideas advanced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will also be considered at some length; in other words, I should not like to have anyone understand that, so far as I am concerned, I am endeavoring to put the bill through as it came from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Montana a question as to that. Am I mistaken in my recollection that the Senator, in giving his views upon this bill before the Public Lands Committee, made the statement that he thought there ought to be a limitation upon the price charged, and suggested that he would not oppose a proposition limiting the price charged to 25 cents per horsepower?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Utah is certainly mistaken. I have no recollection of ever having appeared before the committee on this bill. I am sure he will find no statement of that kind from me.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps the Senator did not appear on this bill, but I think he appeared before the committee on a similar bill at another session of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. I have no recollection of ever having appeared on the water-power bill; I am sure about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, was it on the land-leasing bill that the Senator appeared?

Mr. WALSH. I did make a long statement on the nonmineral land-leasing bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I take the Senator's word for it.

Now, I desire to say to the Senator from New York, in this same connection, that I believe the Public Lands Committee were almost a unit, if not a unit, in taking the position that whatever was charged for the horsepower created would be passed on to the ultimate consumer, particularly when it was more than 25 cents per horsepower. They also took the position that the Government should not impose a burdensome tax upon the development of western industries, either in the development of oil or in the development of electric power.

I wish also to say that I have heard representatives of the Interior Department state time and again that they thought that the only charge that should be made was one that would pay the expenses to which the Government would be put in administering the law. I think that that is the policy that ought to be followed. I do not see why the people of the West should be burdened by a greater charge than that by the Government, if any charge is made at all. I do not see why they should be compelled to pay not only for the administration of the law by the Government but also a profit upon the water used that actually belongs to the States. I will admit that the 25 cents per horsepower charge seems insignificant, but——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not make that criticism.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to say that a 25 cents per horsepower charge will more than pay for the administration of the law; and that is all that the Government of the United States ought to impose upon the people of the West, even if this mistaken policy is finally adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Utah, and likewise to the Senator from Montana, that I do not criticize the figure, 25 cents per horsepower; I do not know whether it is cheap or expensive. I have not the slightest idea, for I am not informed on the subject; but the method of fixing a tax here, a flat rate, based entirely on the horsepower generated, is not an equal distribution of taxation. The tax should bear some relation to the value of the product which is being taxed. This method bears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the comparison made by the Senator of the value of land in the heart of a city——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I used an exaggerated case.

Mr. SMOOT. That comparison does not apply to this bill, for 99¾ per cent—I think that is the estimate of the department—of the horsepower that will be created under this bill will be created in the Rocky Mountain States; and I think 76 per cent of that 99¾ per cent will be created in forest reserves. The Government lands that will be used, if this bill becomes a law, are next to worthless; in fact, if it were not for the water owned by the State flowing by the lands, many of them could not be sold for 10 cents an acre. They are not grazing lands; they are simply mountainous lands that are of no earthly use whatever unless for a power site.

Further, I desire to say to the Senator that I believe that we are trying to do indirectly what the Constitution of the United States says that we can not do directly. Therefore I am opposed to this kind of legislation. I believe the bill has been improved by the amendments reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands. I suppose that other Senators will take an opposite view, and I believe that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] was echoing the sentiments of not only Mr. Pinchot, the leader of the conservation movement, but of hundreds of other people in the United States, when he said that we were giving away these great resources to private parties and corporations to develop them.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I desire to assure the Senator from Utah that I am one of the Senators who do not have any conversations with Gifford Pinchot. I want to assure the Senator also that I know something about the water powers. I have lived on the frontier all my life, and know that they have been given away. I will say further to the Senator from Utah that I believe he believes that it would be poor business for the Government of the United States to invest $30,000,000 in a nitrate plant and then not have water power to run its own mills.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course the Senator knows I voted against that proposal, and the Senator knows that I am opposed to any kind of legislation of that kind. I have made this statement simply because I do not believe that many Senators understand the full import of this bill, its far-reaching effect, and what it means to the growth and development of the Western States, but before this discussion ends and before the bill is voted upon there will be enough said in this Chamber to convince Senators of what the effect of it really will be on the Western States. The difficulty, however, is that we can not get Senators in the Chamber to listen.

Mr. THOMAS. And, Mr. President, the discussion will not be confined to the other side of the Chamber either.

Mr. SMOOT. And, as the Senator from Colorado well says, the discussion will not be confined to this side of the Chamber. At this time I do not wish to say more upon this subject.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I feel this way about this measure, that, if a majority of Senators do not want this bill, let them defeat it. All I want is a fair discussion of it and a vote on it in order that the sense of the Senate may be had.

Now, I desire to have the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] for a moment. I should like to ask him a question. Suppose a lease-holding corporation should produce a large amount of horsepower on land owned by the Government and from water owned by a State, and through improvidence and injudicious contracts should sell its electrical power at too low a price, or through extravagant management, paying large salaries to its officials and perhaps erecting fine, large office buildings, and making other expenditures which are not justified, should derive no profit out of any of the horsepower developed, does the Senator think, under those circumstances, they should pay no rental for the land and for the benefits they have received from the Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator from Montana misunderstood my suggestion. It was merely a suggestion that came to my mind at the moment.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator said they ought to pay on the profits of the business, as I understood him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I did not mean that. I meant to suggest whether it would be practicable to arrange a method of paying compensation, if we are to have compensation, based upon the price charged by the company to its consumers.

Mr. MYERS. It might be practicable, but the committee thought best to establish the basis provided in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has said that in some cases the horsepower may be put at a price to the consumer of something like $72 and in other cases at about $22, and it struck me that it would be a more equitable and scientific method of taxation to charge them in accordance with the value of their product rather than a flat rate. I do not say, Mr. President, that 25 cents is too low or too high; I do not know as to that.

Mr. MYERS. Much may be said on each side, but the question is to be determined by the Senate when we get down to that point. I adhere to the committee's view, but, of course, others have different views, and it is a matter to be thrashed out in the Senate and decided as the Senate may think best.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from New York that that is altogether permissible under the bill. The lessee makes his contract with the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Interior fixes the compensation that he shall pay, although unfortunately there is a 25-cent limitation in the bill now; but if that limitation is taken off the Secretary of the Interior can fix the rate. Now, it is altogether permissible under this kind of an act for the Secretary to provide that if the lessee will furnish the power at so much per horsepower, his payment to the Government shall be one figure, and if he charges consumers a higher price, his payment to the Government will be a higher one. It will be entirely permissible to regulate the matter as the circumstances will permit under the bill when the limitation is taken off.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was the inclusion of the limitation that induced me to ask the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Montana permit the present occupant of the chair to ask him, Does this bill provide specifically for 25 cents per horsepower arbitrarily as a minimum, or simply as an arbitrary rate?

Mr. WALSH. As the maximum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana think, as a legal matter, that we could prescribe the rate without regard to an investigation one way or the other as to the reasonableness or justice of the rate?

Mr. WALSH. I think so, because we are merely giving the right to occupy Government land, and we can prescribe whatever terms we see fit upon which that land may be occupied. We say the Secretary can ask whatever terms he cares to ask for the right to occupy these lands, but he must not take more than 25 cents per horsepower developed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator assumes the position that the landlord has the right to say for what price he will rent, and if the person who wishes to obtain the land does not wish to pay the price, that ends it.

Mr. WALSH. He does not need to take it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He occupies no place whatever as the agent of the public on that basis of the regulation of rates for public service.

Mr. WALSH. No. I may say to the Presiding Officer that after the lessee gets the right to occupy the public land, makes his development, and then goes into the business of selling and delivering electrical power, of course then his charges are subject to public regulation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thanks the Senator.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill—I see the hour is getting very late—whether it is his intention to hold the Senate longer in session this afternoon?

Mr. MYERS. I have not consulted with other Senators, but I have not thought of asking for a night session. That had not occurred to me, but I suppose we might run until 6 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Chair if the reading of the report has been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it has not been concluded. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to have it concluded?

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the reading of the report be concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, as follows:

Sections 17 and 18 confer upon the States of Colorado and New Mexico and any citizen or citizens thereof, respectively, the right to institute litigation to determine certain important and disputed questions. These questions are matters of importance to the people of those States. It is desirable that some method be provided for lawful adjudication thereof. These sections relate to the use of the waters of a flowing stream, interstate in its character, and it is believed they are pertinent and germane to the subject of this act. It is believed by the committee to be proper and just to incorporate them in this bill.

Section 19 provides, upon certain terms and conditions, for the enlargement of the works of any project or the extension of its service and for subjecting it to other purposes in connection with the use of water. It is believed to be properly safeguarded.

Senate bill 1060, Sixty-fourth Congress, similar to this in principle, was referred to the honorable Secretary of the Interior for a report thereon to the Committee on Public Lands, and the report thereon of the Secretary is as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"Washington, December 23, 1915.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt, with your request for report thereupon, of S. 1060, a bill 'To provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.'

"The measure is similar in form to that favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and in many respects similar to H. R. 16673, passed by the House of Representatives during the last session of Congress, and reintroduced in the present session as H. R. 408. In substance, the bill proposes to substitute a definite 50-year tenure to use of public lands and national forests suitable for water-power development and transmission for the revocable permit authorized by existing law. The right is reserved in the United States to, at the end of the 50-year period and upon not less than three years' notice, take over the properties upon compensating the permittee, or renewal may be made to the original permittee, or permit issued to another. The permits to be irrevocable except upon breach of conditions, and any forfeiture to be through appropriate proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction after notice in writing to the permittee."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, where is the Secretary reading?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Secretary is reading a letter from the Secretary of the Interior found on the bottom of page 10.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, as follows:

The regulation and control of service and of charges to consumers is left to the State where the plant is located, and assumed by the United States where the plant is located in a Territory, or where it involves an interstate use of the power.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the remainder of the Secretary's letter be dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want that letter read, Mr. President. I want the whole report in here. I am following it carefully.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. So am I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address their remarks to the Chair.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, as follows:

Where the development is in a State which has not provided a commission or other authority for control of such matters, the right of control is retained by the United States until such time as the State may provide therefor.

The bill provides that nothing therein shall be construed as affecting or interfering with the law and regulations of the States relating to the appropriation, use, or distribution of water.

Individuals holding revocable permits under the present law are given the option to exchange the same for a 50-year tenure under this bill.

It seems that Congress has always adhered to the policy of retaining control of water-power resources in the people, though permitting their development and use through private enterprise. See acts of Congress of May 14, 1896 (29 Stat., 120), and February 15, 1901 (31 Stat., 790). The present measure follows the same policy and substitutes for the present revocable permit a certain tenure which it is believed will secure the capital necessary for the development of these resources. As stated in previous reports, an urgent demand for some such legislation exists throughout the country, and investigations made during the past summer support that view.

The failure to utilize the water-power resources is an economic waste. Saving of coal, oil, gas, and timber can be effected by the development and use of hydroelectrical power and arid lands which can not be reached by gravity water can be irrigated through pumping systems operated by electricity; nitrates in the atmosphere for the fertilization of farm lands, for the manufacture of ammunition, and for other vital uses can be made available by cheap power. Capital which will not be invested under existing laws would be utilized for power development under a law giving definite and certain tenure. It is apparent that the public interest requires the enactment of such a law as soon as possible.

I have not gone into detail with respect to the various features of the bill, because they were thoroughly discussed before the House of Representatives and before your committee during the past session. I am inclined to the view that sections 17, 18, and 19 should be omitted from the bill. The purpose sought to be accomplished by section 17 may be attained by an amendment to section 8, like that recommended by the House Committee on the Public Lands with respect to section 8 of H. R. 408. Sections 18 and 19 have no direct relation to water-power development and would better be the subject of separate legislation if same be deemed necessary. As already stated, I believe that the proposed legislation is necessary and vital, and recommend that the bill, with such modifications as are thought advisable in the public interest be enacted.

Cordially,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Montana if that recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior has been followed in the bill that has been finally reported to the Senate?

Mr. MYERS. That letter of recommendation was written in regard to the bill as introduced in the House of Representatives. Of course, since then considerable changes have been made in the bill in the House, and further changes have been recommended by the Senate committee, so that the bill now in print and on the desks is, of course, not in all details the same bill as the one to which the letter refers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am referring now especially to sections 17, 18, and 19 of the House bill, about which the report was made.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, of course, extensive changes have been made since that letter was written.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Can the Senator answer me as to whether the ideas expressed in the last paragraph of the Secretary's letter have been complied with?

Mr. MYERS. I have not a copy of the report before me. I will ask to have a copy of the report brought to me. I was listening to it, but I do not recall——

Mr. WALSH. I might say, on behalf of my colleague, that the letter just read refers to an entirely different bill, Senate bill 1060, not the bill before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Can the Senator tell me whether there are any provisions in this bill corresponding to the sections 17, 18, and 19 to which the Secretary objects?

Mr. WALSH. I have not Senate bill 1060 before me, and I have not any recollection as to what those sections do refer to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, as follows:

This bill, House bill 408, was referred to the House Committee on the Public Lands to the honorable Secretary of the Interior for his opinion thereof, and his response thereto is here given, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 30, 1915.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your request for report upon H. R. 408, a bill to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

The measure is, with the exception of a few amendments designed to meet objections raised, similar to H. R. 16673, Sixty-third Congress, second session, recommended by this department and by your committee and passed by the House of Representatives August 24, 1914. All of the reasons presented in support of the bill as it was considered by the Sixty-third Congress are, I believe, applicable to the present measure. The purpose and effect of the several sections of the measure may be briefly stated as follows:

Section 1 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease to qualified persons or corporations, including municipalities or irrigation districts, public lands or property of the United States, except in national parks or military reservations, for a period of not exceeding 50 years for the development, generation, or transmission of hydroelectric power. Provision is made therein for a preliminary permit to protect applicants while securing necessary data and information prerequisite to application for a lease.

Section 2 is designed to insure diligence on the part of the lessee in the reasonable development and continuous operation of the project, and in the interest of consumers authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to prevent the lessee from delivering more than 50 per cent of the output to one consumer where there is a present demand from others.

Section 3 provides for the control of service and of charges for service and of the issuance of stock and bonds where the lessee is doing business in a territory of an interstate character. It also gives the Secretary of the Interior discretion in permitting combination of plants and lines in particular cases, but prohibits any arrangement in restraint of trade or for increase of prices.

Section 4 forbids the sale or delivery of power to a distributing company except upon the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior, although provision is made for emergency sales for limited periods. The lessee is given the right to mortgage the leasehold, but successors in interest, under judicial or foreclosure sales or otherwise, are required to take subject to all conditions imposed upon the original lessee.

Section 5, sometimes designated as the recapture provision, is designed to permit the United States to act for the best interests of the public in the light of conditions found to exist at the termination of any 50-year period. After due notice and at the expiration of the lease the United States has the right to take over all properties dependent for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease, paying to the lessee the actual cost of rights of way, water rights, lands, and interests purchased and used by the lessee and the reasonable value of all other property taken over, including structures and fixtures, values to be determined upon by mutual agreement, or, if that be impracticable, by proceedings in the United States courts. It is further provided that the reasonable value mentioned shall not include franchise values, good will, or intangible elements.

Section 6 provides that if the United States does not take over the property or renew the lease to the original lessee, it may be leased to a third party, upon his payment for the plant in the manner provided by section 5.

Section 7 permits the sale of power or energy under contracts extending beyond the life of the lease, subject, however, to approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 8 deals with the collection of charges or rentals and the disposal of the proceeds. Where the power is generated and developed, in whole or in part upon lands belonging to the United States, charges may be measured by the power so developed and disposed of, and where public lands are used only for transmission lines, charges under said section may be based upon mileage of lands occupied. The proceeds are devoted to the reclamation of arid lands in the Western States and upon repayment of the amount so advanced for reclamation, 50 per cent thereof is to be paid to the States within the boundaries of which the power or energy was generated and developed. Leases may be given municipal corporations solely for municipal uses without charge; also leases to individuals for domestic, mining, or irrigation use for power developments, not exceeding 25 horsepower.

Section 9 provides that, in States which have no commission or body authorized to regulate service and rates or stock and bond issues, the Secretary of the Interior may exercise supervision, but only until the State has made provision for control or regulation of the specific matter involved.

Section 10 is designed to permit agricultural or other use, under the public-land laws, of areas withdrawn for water-power development and transmission, subject, however, to the right of the United States or its lessees to occupy and use any part of such lands reasonably necessary for power development or transmission.

Section 11 gives the authority to examine books and accounts of lessees, and requires them to make reports covering the various phases of their business.

Section 12 provides that leases may be forfeited and canceled only by appropriate proceedings in the United States court for the district in which the property is situated, in cases where the lessee, after proper notice, has failed to comply with the law or the conditions recited in the lease.

Section 13 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make necessary rules and regulations.

Section 14 provides that each lease shall be conditioned upon the acceptance by the lessee of terms and conditions of the law and the lease, and further provides that nothing in the law shall be construed as interfering with the laws of any State or of the Territory of Alaska relating to the control, appropriation, or distribution of water.

Section 15 repeals all provisions of law in conflict with the provisions of this bill and makes provisions for certain specific cases; also stipulating that nothing in this bill shall be held as preventing the granting of rights of way for irrigation under existing laws and granting in connection therewith a lease under this bill for such electrical power or energy as may be developed or transmitted as incident or subsidiary to the purpose of irrigation.

Section 16 is designed to make it clear that the measure does not apply to navigation dams or structures under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or to lands purchased or held in connection with such structures.

It has never been the policy of Congress to pass title to lands valuable for water power permanently to private holders. The first act upon the subject, May 14, 1896 (29 Stat., 120), as well as the existing law of February 15, 1901 (31 Stat., 790), simply authorized the granting of a temporary permit, the latter act expressly providing "That any permission given by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successors in his discretion, and shall not be held to confer any right or easement or interest in, to, or over any public land, reservation, or park." It will thus be seen that Congress from the very beginning wisely determined upon and adhered to the policy of retaining control of these valuable resources in the people, though permitting their development and use through private enterprise. The present measure follows the same policy, but substitutes for the present revocable permit a certain tenure, which it is believed will secure the capital essential for the proper development of these valuable sites as rapidly as the public interest may require.

It has been the constant complaint of those who are or might be interested in this line of development that it is impossible to finance large and expensive undertakings upon the basis of a permit revocable in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior or his successor. It has further been asserted that it is impracticable to obtain capital and improve large power developments unless the terms and conditions under which the development is to be made and operated are known in advance. This measure, as already indicated, meets both of these objections, giving a fixed and certain tenure and providing for the setting out of the terms and conditions in the original lease or permit, no forfeiture of lease to be had except for breach of conditions, and then only through proceedings in the courts.

This measure also contains provisions in the interest of the consumer and of the public generally, looking not only to the present, but to the future. Where the States have made or shall hereafter make provision for the control of service and of charges for service, and of the issuance of stocks and bonds, that matter is left wholly to them in intrastate development and use. Where development and use occur in a State which has not made such provision, the Federal Government retains control only until the State shall do so. Where the development and use is interstate, or wholly within a Territory, control of these matters is retained by the Federal Government. Of even more vital importance is the provision which permits of the taking over of the property at the end of the 50-year leasehold.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to ask that the amendment of the House on Senate bill 703, the vocational education bill, be laid before the Senate for the purpose of asking that the Senate disagree to the House amendment and request a conference with the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate having heard the request of the Senator from Georgia, are there any observations? [A pause.] The Chair lays the amendment of the House before the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, is there objection to the bill, or any provision of it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. It is another bill.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask if that would have the effect of displacing the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair answers no. It is merely to appoint a committee of conference, as a matter of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I just want to get a committee of conference appointed; that is all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I have no objection to that. I want to accommodate the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will wait until to-morrow morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the duty of the Presiding Officer, upon the request of a Senator, to lay down a message from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. PAGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask for a print of 500 copies of the House substitute for the vocational education bill. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] has called my attention to the fact that there is quite a demand for it, and at his instance, as well as my own, I ask that 500 copies be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that ought to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Georgia with respect to the printing of the House substitute. The Chair hears no objection, and it is granted.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, and read as follows:

As has been said many times before, the use of hydroelectric power is just beginning and no one can predict the possibilities and demands of the future. It is vitally important, therefore, that Congress shall adhere to its previous policy and not permit these large and valuable resources of the public lands to pass from the control of the people forever. This measure, while affording tenure to the original developer for a generous and definite period, leave Congress free to act as the then existing conditions shall dictate at the end of the several 50-year periods.

I stated in my reports to your committee dated April 29 and May 23, 1914, that an urgent demand for legislation like that contained in H. R. 408 exists throughout the country. Further investigations during the past summer have confirmed that view, the sentiment among water-power engineers and promoters and among bankers accustomed to financing such enterprises being almost unanimously in favor of some such legislation.

As already set out before your committee, the failure to utilize the water-power resources is an economic waste. Coal, oil, gas, and timber which could be conserved for the future or for use in localities where power is not available are now being consumed in places where inexhaustible water power could be developed. Lands which would produce abundant crops under irrigation lie arid and unproductive because of the failure to develop hydroelectric power, which would pump water to them. The nitrates in the atmosphere, a source of wealth and a means of providing for the rejuvenation of exhausted soils, and of providing an available supply of necessary materials for munitions of war, continue unused because of the lack of cheap and extensive power development. Available capital lies idle because it will not be hazarded upon the revocable permit law. All of these conditions and many others which might be set out justify and call for the enactment of such legislation as you propose.

I therefore recommend that H. R. 408 be enacted at the earliest possible moment.

Cordially, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to proceed further without a quorum. If the Senate desires to adjourn at this point, I will not call for a quorum.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I trust we will adjourn.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. The reading of the reports having been called for, it seems to me that they ought to be finished to-night, so that to-morrow we may take up the discussion of the bill and get to a vote on the amendments.

Mr. THOMAS. It is now nearly 6 o'clock, and I think we should adjourn at that hour.

Mr. MYERS. Let me ask the Senator from Michigan a question. If we adjourn now, will the Senator from Michigan withdraw his request for the further reading of the report?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator sees that practically no Senators have been listening to the reading, and all the reports can be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It would be exactly the same situation when we get to a discussion of the bill. There will not be any more Senators here when the debate is going on than there is at the reading of the report. I do not think anybody can give us any more light on the subject than the report gives us, and I think the reading ought to be completed.

Mr. MYERS. Of course, debate has got to go on if Senators wish to talk; but it does seem to me, in view of what has transpired this afternoon, when we have seen the reading of these reports listened to by very few Senators, there being only a few present, and very few of those who were present paying any attention to the reading, if we adjourn the Senator ought to be willing to withdraw his request for the reading of the report and let us adjourn until to-morrow and then take up the discussion of the bill and amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Montana decline to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. THOMAS. If he does, I will make it.

Mr. MYERS. I will say, before answering that, that I think we ought to finish the reading of the reports to-night, with the understanding that when they are finished we will adjourn. Those who do not wish to listen to the reports may go away, and those who want to listen may stay and listen.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to remind the Senator from Montana that the hour of 6 o'clock has arrived, and it is very plain we can do no further business to-day. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WALSH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the demand? [After a pause.] Only four Senators have seconded the demand.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for a vote on the motion. If the Senator from Montana wants to suggest the absence of a quorum, of course, he can do so.

Mr. WALSH. When the Senator from Colorado addresses me in that way he makes a very strong appeal. I do not want to do it, but, of course, the obstructive character of the proceedings are obvious to everyone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to ask the Senator to withdraw the motion, otherwise the Chair will have to rule that the whole debate is out of order.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the parliamentary status, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WALSH. I asked for the yeas and nays, and I understood that there were 20 Senators in the Chamber and 4 raised their hands. So I have a constitutional right for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair having confused the matter, the Chair now asks if the demand for the yeas and nays is supported. [After a pause.] The Chair counts five as supporting the demand. Does the Senator from Montana differ from the Chair? The Chair recognizes on the other side 18 Senators present on the floor. More than one-fifth of the Senators present supporting the demand, the roll will be called on the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate adjourn.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], and therefore withhold my vote. I desire to be counted for a quorum.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], and withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I inquire if the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the general pair I have with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It has not been the custom here to observe pairs on a motion to adjourn, but this seems to be an exception. I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and take the liberty of transferring the pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "yea."

Mr. STONE. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). Assuming that pairs did not count on motions to adjourn, I voted; but as others have transferred their pairs, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the negative). I had assumed that there was no need of making a transfer of pairs, but I now prefer to make one. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I should have made a transfer of my pair before voting. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and let my vote stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Brandegee	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	Wadsworth
Cummins	Page	Smith, Mich.	Williams
Gallinger	Poindexter	Thomas

Culberson	Kern	Penrose	Watson
Curtis	Kirby	Pomerene	Weeks
Dillingham	La Follette	Ransdell	Works
du Pont	Lane	Reed
Fall	Lee, Md.	Sherman

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I rose to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to hold that the record discloses the absence of a quorum. He is now also fortified by the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, and the Chair will order a roll call.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Chamberlain	Jones	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Stone
Cummins	Lewis	Saulsbury	Swanson
Fletcher	Myers	Shafroth	Thomas
Gallinger	Newlands	Sheppard	Townsend
Hollis	Page	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call discloses the presence of 28 Senators.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the names of the absent Senators be called.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pardon the Chair. The Senator from Montana was on his feet. For what purpose does the Senator from Montana rise?

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

Mr. THOMAS. I have moved that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a point of order made by the Senator from Montana. He will state it.

Mr. WALSH. No business has been transacted since the last motion to adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to decide that a roll call is business, a ruling the Chair has never been able to agree with.

Mr. WALSH. I am rather surprised at that ruling of the Chair. I have no recollection about it, because if that is the case, all a filibusterer needs to do is to make motions to adjourn.

Mr. STONE. I would not like to have that ruling go without protest.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. I trust the Chair will withdraw his ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair merely announced that he had heard such a ruling from the Chair, but inasmuch as Senators wished to be heard the Chair was willing to have them heard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Idaho that the call for a quorum is not now considered, and it will be decided by a motion to adjourn, which is now pending.

Mr. BORAH. I thought there was a call for a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not a motion to adjourn always in order?

Mr. SWANSON and others. No.

Mr. THOMAS. My question is addressed to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is at present a motion to adjourn. Upon that a point of order has been made. That point of order is pending before the Chair. If the Senator from Montana desires to be heard, the Chair is entertaining his desires in that respect. If he is seeking to fortify the Chair or himself by precedents, the Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Montana, as a mere matter of information, to the fact that in connection with the shipping bill he will discover that a ruling was made against the present occupant of the chair. The present occupant of the chair protested then.

Mr. WALSH. I find a precedent, doubtless the one referred to by the Chair. I will read the precedent. It is as follows:

The river and harbor bill being under consideration——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order is made by the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate is not in order. The point of order is sustained. The Senate will be in order consistent with its general orderly procedure.

Mr. WALSH. The precedent is as follows:

The river and harbor bill being under consideration,
Mr. CLAPP suggested the absence of a quorum.
Mr. RANSDELL. I make the point of order that there has been no business transacted since we had the last quorum called.
Mr. CLAPP. I understand that there has been a motion to adjourn, and that the motion was acted on.
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON). If the Chair remembers correctly, since the last roll call there has been a motion to adjourn, and if the Chair recalls the precedents correctly, that constitutes intervening business in the meaning of the rule. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 15355, 15361.)

That is the only precedent that I find; but I am very sure the Senate can not indorse any such precedent as that, and I think the Senator from New Hampshire, who is usually very careful about these matters, would not care to have a precedent of that character established, because it would be simply a matter of a Senator standing up here, making a motion to adjourn, suggesting the absence of a quorum, and continuing that procedure indefinitely. Right in the midst of all our business a Senator might make a motion to adjourn. The motion is lost, a full quorum voting; then a quorum call is made; the call discloses that a quorum is present, and then the same Senator can get up and make a motion to adjourn. The motion is lost. He then again suggests the absence of a quorum, when the roll must be called, and he can simply continue to make quorum calls and motions to adjourn indefinitely. I submit that that is not good sense and it is not reasonable. I scarcely think the Senator from Colorado would care to have that kind of a rule crystallized into a definite practice of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. If the point of order of the Senator is well taken is it not a fact that we must stay here now until we get a quorum before we can adjourn, even though it keeps us here until 12 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. WALSH. That is my understanding.

Mr. THOMAS. I should dislike very much to see that understanding become the rule of the Senate. If, as a matter of fact, on a motion to adjourn when the roll call discloses no quorum, and then when the absence of a quorum is suggested the roll call still discloses no quorum, we are powerless even to adjourn until we obtain a quorum, it certainly puts the Senate in a more helpless condition than I ever supposed it was, and my opinion of it in that respect has not been very high.

Mr. WALSH. Let me suggest to the Senator——

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will pardon me, my reading of the precedent is that the motion to adjourn is the only business which can be transacted in the absence of a quorum except measures to obtain a quorum. I do not think the Senator will make very much progress with the bill if we have to stay here and wait for a voting quorum at this hour of the evening and attempt to go ahead with this matter in that way. I do not think so, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that I think he is mistaken in that. The Senate is not helpless at all. It has the power to compel the attendance of absent Senators and to get a quorum here.

So far as the present status of the measure under consideration is concerned we have progressed about one-third with the reading of the voluminous report and views of the minority, and it will take us three days at the present rate of progress to get through reading the entire document. Now, I ask my associates here whether we had better go on and finish the reading of the report and let those who want to go home go home, or whether we had better allow this kind of thing to go on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is indulging the discussion upon the theory that the debate is taking place on the point of order, and not on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not care to address the Senate unless I am in order, but I do not think that anything is before the Senate, not even the point of order. I think that we must either adjourn or attempt to secure a quorum, and I believe we can adjourn; but if the Senate thinks to the contrary, let us go ahead and see if we can get a quorum.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to say that, in my judgment, which may not be worth very much, a motion to adjourn is in order at this time. The absence of a quorum was developed on the roll call, no matter what roll call that was, and then the point of no quorum was suggested, which was entirely unnecessary, because it was the duty of the Chair to order the roll to be called. Certainly, when a call discloses no quorum, a motion to adjourn is then in order, no matter on what question the absence of a quorum may have been disclosed. I think that is clearly the rule of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator hold that on a roll call on a motion to adjourn, which discloses the absence of a quorum, immediately, without any intervening business, another motion to adjourn can be made?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Under the circumstances that have existed in the Senate on this motion, I think a motion to adjourn may be made.

Mr. STONE. I do not know about the circumstances here being any different from those which occur frequently. The point is, that when a motion to adjourn is made and it develops the lack of a quorum, immediately another motion——

Mr. SAULSBURY. No; the Senator misunderstood me. Not under all circumstances, but certainly less than a quorum can adjourn at any time. A roll call on that question would be conclusive, and should be announced by the Chair; but under these circumstances there was a motion to adjourn after the absence of a quorum had been disclosed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it seems to me that if it were possible to pile one motion to adjourn right on top of another ad infinitum we never could get a quorum. A Senator could keep moving to adjourn and could conduct a filibuster without limit as to time. I think some business ought to intervene. There was something here that might be called business. There was a motion, as I recall, to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of absentees.

Mr. STONE. Well, to call the roll; and after the Presiding Officer had said there were so many votes "aye" and so many "no," which disclosed the lack of a quorum, some Senator said that he demanded a roll call with a view of producing a quorum, and the roll was called. Still no quorum was developed. If that is intervening business, possibly the motion to adjourn could be repeated.

We have been over this thing so often that I do not care to debate it again now; but I do wish that the Senator in charge of this bill, in view of this situation and not having given notice of the intention to protract the session unduly or beyond what is customary, would consent to request of the Senate that all further calls be dispensed with and that he would make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to adjourn is not in order, a motion by me to adjourn would not be in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a motion to adjourn is not debatable; and I trust the Chair will rule on the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, that the motion to adjourn is not debatable, is conceded; but the Chair calls attention to the fact that there was a point of order against his ruling, and that the proceedings have been on the discussion of the point of order. If the point of order is abandoned, then the question before the Senate is the motion to adjourn; but the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] desired to present to the Chair some precedents to offset that which the Chair had called to his attention, and the Chair is waiting for that order of business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Chair make a ruling?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair called the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that there had been a ruling, which held that the call of the roll in the meantime was intervening business; and the Senator from Montana desired to bring to the Chair's attention that such a ruling really did not apply under the present circumstances, and it was upon that that the Chair was waiting for the Senator from Montana to be heard.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Chair did not, then, in his own person make a ruling?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced practically that he was bound by the precedent and stated the precedent, and then waited for any dissent that the Senate might indicate to that position. The Senator from Montana desired to be heard, and the Chair is waiting for him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, considering that it would be extremely unfortunate if any such precedent were established here, and yielding to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. WALSH. No; I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not care how we accomplish the purpose so long as we adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Thereupon (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 12, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 11, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we pray for increased faith and confidence in the overruling of Thy providence in the affairs of men that we may meet the conditions of life with a full determination to overcome all barriers and press toward the mark of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, assured that every well-directed effort conscientiously pursued shall bring to us the "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord"; and all praise be Thine now and evermore. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Delaware rise?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to insert some remarks in the RECORD on the work of the Children's Bureau.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting some matter touching the Children's Bureau. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19300. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 1093. An act for the relief of James Anderson; and

H. R. 10007. An act for the relief of William H. Woods.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6807. An act fixing and establishing a boundary line between the property of the United States of America on Salmon Bay, State of Washington, and the property of the Betterton-Morgan Co. (Inc.), a corporation, giving authority and providing for the conveyance of property in connection therewith, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur March 1, 1917, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his motion for a minute to see whether, pending that motion, we can make some agreement as to time.

Mr. MOON. Well, I offered an agreement day before yesterday as to time—three hours to a side.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. MOON. I then agreed to yield one hour of my three hours to your folks in opposition to the bill, but it was not agreed to. I am still willing to grant anything reasonable.

Mr. STEENERSON. Of course, I did not understand that that amount yielded was to be used by my side. I want half the time.

Mr. MOON. I yielded one hour of my time to opposition to the bill day before yesterday. I am ready to agree to any reasonable time necessary.

Mr. STEENERSON. I had Members on the Republican side opposed to the same item, and I did not see——

Mr. MOON. I did not intend that all the time I proposed to yield should be used by Democrats any more than Republicans, but the men opposed to the bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. However that may be, that is not an important item, in my estimation. There are other items I would like in general debate to discuss; in fact, I would like to discuss the whole bill.

Mr. MOON. I agree with the gentleman that that is not an important item at all, and in view of the existing law there is really nothing in that discussion.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; there is nothing in it.

Mr. MANN. Well, is there any objection in agreeing that the gentleman from Minnesota shall have control of three hours?

Mr. MOON. Suppose we make it four hours—two hours to a side?

Mr. STEENERSON. Make it two hours and a half to a side.

Mr. MOON. Well, I am willing to do that.

The SPEAKER. Has anybody a request to make or not?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestion from the gentleman from Minnesota, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to five hours—two and a half hours to a side—half of the time to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The SPEAKER. That is for the whole bill?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know if I can get some time out of that two and a half hours?

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman wants to object to the agreement, he can get a whole hour; that is more than I can give him.

Mr. COX. I do not want to object to the agreement, but I think I have a right to make that inquiry. I am a member of the committee.

Mr. MOON. Any member of the committee of the House can get my time; I do not care to take a minute. The gentleman can have every minute. I want to get this bill through with as little debate as possible.

Mr. COX. I did not want to insult the gentleman, and I am simply trying to preserve my rights.

Mr. MOON. I will yield the gentleman all the time I can, but I can not tell how much time now. If there is nobody else wants to speak, I will yield him the two hours and a half.

Mr. COX. I do not want two hours and a half. I do not want to exceed one hour at the most. If I can get that, I am perfectly well satisfied.

Mr. MOON. I will not agree to any particular time if I am to control the time in debate. If you give me the two hours and a half, all right; if not, then the debate is unlimited.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that general debate shall not exceed five hours, half the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19410, the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19410, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House general debate on this bill is limited to five hours, two and a half hours to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and two and a half hours by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to use any time?

Mr. MOON. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana want?

Mr. COX. Wait a little.

Mr. MOON. I am ready to go to the bill under the five-minute rule, unless somebody wants to go on with a speech.

Mr. COX. Can not the gentleman wait until the other side——

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman from Minnesota wishes to use time, I have no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. I was engaged, and I did not listen to what the gentleman said.

Mr. MOON. I said that the chairman of the committee would yield time to the gentleman from Indiana, if he wanted it. The gentleman from Indiana prefers that the gentleman from Minnesota go ahead and use some time, if he desires it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Of course it is customary for the majority to use the time, but I am ready to use some of it in view of the fact that a discussion of the pneumatic tubes occurred day before yesterday, and I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the decision of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to rule out the pneumatic-tube service in the United States, with the exception of certain portions of it in the city of New York, has aroused tremendous opposition on the part of the business interests of the country. I assume that the Postal Department was established in the interest of the people and that the wishes of the people ought to be respected with reference to the continuance of any part of it that has proved efficient and worth while and that has tended to develop and increase the service. The pneumatic tube was established originally in Philadelphia in 1893. A tube with a 5-inch cylinder was installed between what is known as the Bourse substation and the main post office. This was during the administration of Postmaster General Wanamaker; and while no rental was at first charged during the experimental stages, subsequently a rental of $3,000 per annum was agreed upon, and I believe that was afterwards raised to $4,000. For 23 years the Government encouraged the operation of the tubes, and the service was extended from this less than a mile of underground service in Philadelphia until it was introduced in at least six of the large cities of the United States. So far as Philadelphia, which I am discussing in particular, was concerned, the service was extended until under the streets in congested districts we had about 10 miles of underground service. By reason of the development of the service, the cost of construction and operation, and the necessary consultations and adjustments that must have been had as between the department and the operators of the tubes, terms were finally agreed upon by which an annual rental of $17,000 per mile was agreed upon in the contracts. That $17,000 per mile is what is being paid now, and it is what the Government objects to paying—that is to say it is what the present administration objects to paying—for until the present administration there has been no disposition to abolish the pneumatic-tube service. The present administration has opposed the service, and methods have been employed by it which some business men regard as somewhat reprehensible, since the effort seems to be to get rid of those whom the Government induced to go into the pneumatic-tube business. This is supported by the reports of various commissions that have been appointed from time to time by authority of law for the purpose of looking into, investigating, and reporting upon the pneumatic-tube service as it has developed. Most of these commissions, in fact all of them, reported favorably to the operation of the tubes.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. COX. Now, I am sure the gentleman wants to be right in his statement. He does not want to accuse this administration of being the sole administration that opposed it. Does not the gentleman know that in 1901 there was a postal commission appointed to investigate the pneumatic-tube proposition, composed of Edward O. Wolcott, W. B. Allison, Thomas S. Martin, E. F. Loud, W. H. Moody, T. C. Catchings, and William H. Fleming, and after exhaustive investigation and hearings for weeks and months they reported against the further establishment of these tubes. And that was under a Republican administration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I answer the gentleman by quoting from an official report, or so much as I am able to quote in my time, showing, as I contend, that Congress and the Government have encouraged the use of these tubes from the beginning, and that will answer the gentleman's question with regard to the commissions which from time to time have been appointed. I will quote a commission which was headed by the Hon. HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, in favor of the pneumatic tubes.

Mr. COX. That was gotten up for a different purpose. It was a congressional committee gotten up for the sole purpose of seeing whether the Government should buy these tubes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it reported favorably. I will quote from this official report, which I think will fully justify the statement that I have made that the Government from the beginning has encouraged the operation and the increased use of these pneumatic tubes. They were established in 1893, as I have indicated. It was a voluntary proposition originally, but it was encouraged by the Postmaster General of the United States. That Postmaster General is now a private citizen, but he still stands for the operation of the tubes in large cities, believing, as a business man, that they are of tremendous service to the country particularly with regard to the movement of mails in congested districts.

I have not the time to quote all the laws justifying the tube service, but in 1901 the Postmaster General made a report to Congress as directed—and I do not know whether this is the report the gentleman refers to or not—giving the results of an investigation of the pneumatic-tube service by local postal officials, this being revised by a general committee of postal officials, and this was officially passed upon by a commission of seven experts outside of the Postal Service, representative men of high engineering ability. They presented a number of conclusions, amongst which the following was most important:

They found the new method of mail transportation to be a valuable and mechanically successfully system, practically adapted in an admirable manner to the purposes of the Post Office Department and of great advantage to the business interests of the country in facilitating mail transmission.

I can not take time now to read the further conclusions of this commission. That was in 1901. Whether the gentleman is in error about his statement or not I do not know, but there was a commission that reported in 1901 that was wholly in favor of the pneumatic tube as a commercial proposition and as a distinct advantage to the Postal Service.

In 1902 the Post Office appropriation bill, approved April 21, provided for the transmission of mail by a pneumatic tube or other similar device, $500,000. I will not go further into that, for want of time, but that was a bid for a continuance of the service, coming from and with the authority of the Government itself. In 1903, during the fiscal year, the pneumatic-tube service was resumed in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, extended so that on June 30, 1903, there was an aggregate in the three cities in operation of 12,495 miles. The Government approved of the extension and connived at it, whether it directly authorized it, in the opinion of the gentleman, or not.

The appropriation bill of 1904 carried an appropriation for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tube and other similar devices of $500,000. In 1905, on October 4, a commission of three expert postal officials, appointed by a Postmaster General's order of November 15, 1904, to carefully investigate the needs and advisability of extending the pneumatic-tube service, submitted a report, and they recommended an extension of the pneumatic-tube service so that it might be used at Baltimore, Boston, Brooklyn, Chicago, Cincinnati, Kansas City, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, and San Francisco. Here was a commission of the Government, authorized in due form, which recommended an extension of the service from the cities which already enjoyed it to other cities.

It did not recommend Government ownership and control of the service, or Government construction; but it did recommend that the Government advertise for proposals to induce men who had money saved up to invest their money in this pneumatic-tube business. It did go out and seek for men who had the means to come in and employ their capital for the benefit of the Government of the United States, and it did induce them—and it did, in every year thereafter up to the present administration, continue to induce them—to enter into the business of constructing pneumatic tubes for the benefit and advantage of the Government of the United States.

I can not go very extensively into this, but the quotations are numerous from the laws themselves, from 1893 and 1894 down to the present time, justifying the extension of the pneumatic-tube service at the instance of Government officials and of the Congress itself. Now, we of this House are put in the peculiar position to-day of repudiating the acts of Congress with respect to the construction of pneumatic tubes. We are put in the position of doing what unfortunately has been the habit, the legislative habit, of some of the States of this Union, of inviting the saving funds or the capitalists of the country to invest their savings in the construction of railroads and other great public works in States other than the State of the origin of the money, and then by a law passed within the State closing the lion's mouth on the cash in hand and telling the investor to look to the heavens for relief. We are put in the position to-day of confiscating the proceeds of the men and the women who have been induced by the advertisement of the United States, by the influence of the departments of the United States, and by act of Congress itself, to invest their money in good faith in what is substantially a Government enterprise.

I started to say that this opposition had not begun, certainly had not taken such form as to mean confiscation, until the advent of the present administration in the Post Office Department.

Now, I hope that no one will assume that I am personal in this matter, because I have a high personal regard for the Postmaster General. But I question whether the Postmaster General of the United States, good citizen that he is and splendid fellow, but a clever politician withal, would have permitted this green-backed book, entitled "Pneumatic Tube Service," to have gotten out of his possession, so that it might have been read by the business men in the great cities of the United States prior to November 7 last, when the contents of it might have affected the election of a President. I question whether he would have permitted that document, made up by a special committee of his own choosing, employees of his own department, charged apparently to bring in a report in consonance with the wishes of the department—I question whether he would have let that get out of his hands. He had a chance to let it out if he wanted the public to have it, because the report was handed to him October 13, 1916.

What are the facts with respect to this report, this pneumatic-tube service report, which was not in the hands even of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads until a few days before the people got wise to the fact that the pneumatic tubes were to be abolished if the Postmaster General had his way? The report, I say, was not even in the hands of the committee until two or three days before the committee decided to give hearings to the people who wanted to protest against a sudden destruction of public property and the confiscation of private rights.

I personally sought a copy of this report, because the people of my city were anxious to know what this commission had reported. It was known by rumor that the commission of the Postmaster General had reported, but no man outside of the department had knowledge of what that report contained, at least not to the extent that it got to the ears of the public in any way. I say I undertook to get a copy of that report, and was able to obtain it only by the favor of a member or members of the committee, one or more, let us say, who kindly permitted me to look it over a day or two before it was decided that the public might be heard in opposition to it. It was declared to the committee that no man interested in the continuance of the pneumatic-tube service was able to obtain a copy of that report, in volume more than 200 pages of fine print, until the hearings were on and the committee was actually sitting upon the protests.

I sent to the Postmaster General's Office on December 13 for a copy of that report. The hearings had begun on December 11. The committee was in actual session and was hearing witnesses. But on December 14 my messenger reported that the chief clerk's office in the Post Office Department said that the report was then in the hands of the First Assistant Postmaster General, although it had originated in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and this was two days after the hearings had begun. My assistant went to the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General, where the information was that the office had but one copy for its own files; that it was printed for the use of members of the House committee and not as a document, and the only way possible to obtain it would be by borrowing it from a member of the committee. The public had little or no opportunity of confuting that report.

Here is the report, printed at Government expense, more than 200 pages of it, recommending the destruction of many millions of dollars' worth of capital actually invested, and it was not to be had, because there was only one copy of it in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General two days after the hearings had begun. My assistant called at the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, where the information was that they had no copies, and the last report of the kind to their knowledge was Senate Document No. 15, dated October 24, 1904, which they gave to my assistant, and that was the report of the commission headed by the Hon. HOKE SMITH, which reported wholly in favor of the retention of the tubes. That report was the one of which everyone had knowledge, and it was wholly favorable, and it was the last official information upon which the proponents of the tube had to rely. Then inquiry was made of the sales department, superintendent of documents room, Government Printing Office, and the reply was that it had no knowledge of the report. Then my assistant went to the superintendent of work of the Government Printing Office, whose subordinates, after searching, found one copy which, they stated, was the last available copy, and they said they would "be glad to give it to Mr. MOORE." That copy was received.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will, if the gentleman will give me time.

Mr. COX. I have no time to give.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There was some criticism of the report before the committee. The chairman was frank about it. He indicated that the report could be had at the Postmaster General's office. I have indicated how difficult it was to obtain a copy; and yet, as a Member of Congress, I was seeking a report contemplating the destruction of a vast business, which, taken along with the committee hearings then going on, seemed to be in the nature of a decree of execution.

But the Postmaster General came along all right after the hearings. On the 19th of December, five or six days after the hearings were closed, every Member of Congress, I assume, received a very civil and courteous letter from the Postmaster General transmitting a copy of the report.

Now, if that is fair play, I hope there will be no more of it. If this is the method by which men inveigled into investing their money in an enterprise for the public good are to have their money swallowed up by the sudden decree by one or more officials of the Government, perhaps Congress ought to be fully advised so that hereafter Congress will not pass laws inviting men to go into a reputable business to help the Government and then deliberately close the door against the investment they have made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield me 10 minutes more?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield the gentleman 5 minutes more, and that is the absolute limit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The question of economy has been raised. The service at Philadelphia costs about $170,000 a year. More than a million dollars is actually invested in this enterprise, employing many men and involving the machinery and overhead that would do credit to any great engineering establishment. In one fell swoop that business is to be taken away. These tubes are to be closed. That plant is to be destroyed; the men are to be discharged; and that is economy!

Well, while we are complaining that the pneumatic tubes may have increased in rental charges from $3,000 per annum in 1893 to $17,000 per annum per mile now, let us not forget another interesting fact. This very Post Office bill proposes an increase in the number of rural letter carriers, even beyond the estimate of the department, so that instead of appropriating $49,000,000 for the Rural Letter Carrier Service this year, which is the estimate of the department, the Congress shall appropriate $4,000,000 more, or $53,000,000 for that service.

Oh, my friends, if there is anything extravagant in giving this great service to the cities and the country—and I can prove, if I had time, that the country is most interested in getting mail swiftly—if we are complaining of an increased rental to $17,000 per mile per annum in the city tube service, what are we to say of the increase of the Free Rural Delivery Service from $40,000 per annum in 1897, four years after the pneumatic-tube service was installed at $3,000 per mile—from $40,000 per annum to $53,000,000? It looks as if this committee or this department was saving at the spigot and wasting at the bunghole.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The traffic is greatly increased.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The testimony of the business men of my city, handicapped as they were for information about what they were to meet, handicapped as to the contents of this report—the testimony of these gentlemen was that the abandonment of these tubes would be a positive step backward; that it would increase the congestion of traffic in the highways of the great cities, lessen the ability of the carriers to get the mail to the business men and from the business men to their customers in the country, and that generally, so far as the congestion centers are concerned, it would increase the danger of loss of life and limb.

The business of the pneumatic-tube cities, as I am informed, as the result of the findings of the Hughes Commission, constitutes 25 per cent of the total revenue of the Post Office Department from all classes of mail; 74.86 per cent of all this revenue from the six cities referred to, amounting to $56,000,000, is letter mail; and the tubes handle 70 per cent, or $39,200,000 worth of that letter mail. The tubes advance beyond the ordinary method of carriage 21.7 of all letter mail handled, or $8,500,000 worth of mail.

Now, apart from the question of confiscation, which a failure to continue these tubes must raise, is the question of the ability of the farmer to communicate with the merchant of the city with respect to things he has to sell, and that is a——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, under the five-minute rule I shall hope to refer to some of the testimony before the Post Office and Post Roads Committee by business men who were called very suddenly to protect what they believed to be the public interest in these underground tubes. The committee hearings cover nearly 400 pages and, while printed, are of course very difficult to absorb at this time. Since some of the gentlemen proposing the destruction of the tubes seem to regard them as beneficial only to the city in which they happen to be, I submit this very brief abstract from the statement of Mr. A. B. Clemmer, secretary of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia. The chairman of the committee having questioned Mr. Clemmer about the size of the tubes, that gentleman said:

COMMERCIAL EXCHANGE VIEW.

I am more particularly concerned about the business end of it, which I represent. As I said before, the grain members of our exchange did a business of upward of $100,000,000 last year.

However, the leading banks in Philadelphia, and the steamship lines, railroad companies, and provision merchants are also members of our exchange, and if we should figure their business in the total amount or volume of business done it would, of course, necessarily run into hundreds of millions of dollars instead of $100,000,000 worth of business which the grain men did. I want to say that, as far as the grain men are located in the Bourse Building, the members of the commercial exchange who did a business of upward of $100,000,000 last year, 75 per cent or possibly 80 per cent of that business was done through the tube—as far as the Postal Service was concerned.

* * * * * * *

I know the mail matter of the grain merchants is principally first-class mail matter. A great deal of the business done by the grain merchants is done in the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and extending into New England, as well as New York State; and I am here to plead for the interests of the business men of Philadelphia as well as of those States and the farmers therein.

A great deal of our grain is brought, a good portion of it at least, from the States of Delaware and Maryland, and the method in which that is done I would like to explain briefly: Our market closes at 2.15 p. m. daily, except Saturday. Immediately after the close of the market the grain buyer figures to find out how much he can pay for grain up until the opening of the next day's market. As soon as he has figured the prices he is able to pay he gets up a postal-card bid, and he is obliged to get that to Broad Street Station by 3 o'clock. The train reaching the most important grain-selling sections of those States leaves at 3 o'clock from Broad Street Station, and it is absolutely necessary to get the postal bids to Broad Street Station by 3 o'clock in order to meet that train; that is the last train to those sections leaving that day. Most of those sections have only two local trains, one in the morning and one in the afternoon. It is absolutely necessary that the farmer in any of those States receive the bids either that evening or not later than the first thing next morning in order that he may send in his acceptance of the bid by wire next morning to the Philadelphia buyer on or before 10.30 o'clock, the opening of the market, because the bid is not good any longer than that, owing to the possible changes in the market.

The CHAIRMAN. What market is that you are referring to? Is it the general city market or the exchange market?

Mr. CLEMMER. The Philadelphia Exchange market. Now, if the afternoon train should not get that mail, so that it would have to go next morning, it would reach the farmer in Delaware or Maryland entirely too late to be of any use, for the next morning's train will get down there about noon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything to prevent you from getting this mail to the station by automobile?

Mr. CLEMMER. Well, you will notice that the time between the closing of the market, 2.15 in the afternoon, and the departure of the train, at 3 o'clock, is very short.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, is there any difficulty in Philadelphia due to the streets being congested, as in other places?

Mr. CLEMMER. There certainly is. If you will notice, the merchant, in the first place, has to have a little time to figure up his prices after the market closes. We have only three-quarters of an hour, 45 minutes, between the closing of the market and the time of the departure of the train for the merchant to make up his prices, get his postal card printed, and those postal cards to the substation in the Bourse Building, and have it transmitted from there to Broad Street Station. All that has got to be done in 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be satisfactory to you if an arrangement was made by the Government by which you would get a better service than you now get, and at less cost to the Government?

Mr. CLEMMER. We want the best service we can possibly get. But we are perfectly satisfied now.

EFFECT ON THE CLEARING HOUSE.

This testimony was supplemented by Mr. J. Allen Thompson, representing the Philadelphia Clearing House Association, who showed the relationship of the country banks throughout the United States to the pneumatic-tube service in a great city. This statement, in part, was as follows:

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in speaking for the clearing house association in Philadelphia, the great inconvenience and loss to the business interests of the city caused by the discontinuance of the pneumatic-tube service, without the substitution of some like service, can best be appreciated by some figures which I will give you.

The clearing house is the pulse of the business of the city. As the clearings increase or decrease the trade increases or decreases. The Philadelphia Clearing House has never enacted the rule of exchange on country items—that is, checks coming from Maine, from San Francisco, or from Canada, down to the Gulf. These banks are cleared through the Philadelphia Clearing House at par, in consequence of which we handle more items—that is, the city of Philadelphia handles more items of country checks than any city in the Union, with one exception.

Mr. COX. Without any charge?

Mr. THOMPSON. Without any charge. The increase in the business of Philadelphia in the last few years I will give you by reports from the clearing-house association.

In 1914 the clearings for the year were upward of $7,000,000,000, or $26,000,000 daily; in 1915 upward of $8,000,000,000, or $29,000,000 daily. In 11 months in 1916 it amounted to $11,000,000,000; that is an increase of $4,000,000,000 between 1914 and 11 months in 1916.

The clearing house is composed, or the members are composed, of 28 banks and 7 trust companies. The total reserve from these is $828,000,000, but the banks that I will speak of most particularly are those right around the Bourse Station. We have there 12 banks, and the report of the comptroller of November 17, 1915, shows a capital of upward of $14,000,000, a surplus of $30,000,000, and deposits of $352,000,000. I am taking the banks only, not the trust companies, because the banks are the ones that handle the items throughout the country.

Mr. MADDEN. The trust companies are not in the clearing house?

Mr. THOMPSON. Some of them are in the clearing house, but they dump most of that into the national banks. The average number of these cash items forwarded each day from these 12 banks is 181,399, or a total of fifty-four million four hundred and some odd thousand per annum, and amount in money value to $7,618,733,284, upon which a postage amounting to $109,458 annually is paid. The value of the tube service to the banking interests using this station is a saving of from 30 to 35 minutes. By experience we learn, when we want to send a letter to New York, to get it off on a train which leaves at 11 o'clock—the closing hour at the Bourse Station is an hour before the train leaves.

Mr. MADDEN. The ordinary movement?

Mr. THOMPSON. The ordinary movement; yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. Just explain where the Bourse Station is. That is the central business station and the eastern terminus of the pneumatic tube?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The Bourse Station is the exchange?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is right over on Fourth Street, between Market and Chestnut.

Mr. MOORE. It is in a very central business section?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir. These banks I am speaking of are all, with few exceptions, within not over five minutes of that station. Most of them are within three minutes of the station. Now, when we have endeavored to forward letters by special delivery to New York by that train which leaves at 11 o'clock we have sent them over to the Bourse Station and they have not arrived at their destination. This was some years ago, and we made an investigation and we found that our envelopes were too large for the tube.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the size of the tube?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know. I know nothing about the tube system. I only know the result, and I handle the mail in the bank, and every complaint is turned over to me.

The CHAIRMAN. You adjusted the envelope to the tube?

Mr. THOMPSON. We adjusted the envelope to the tube.

The CHAIRMAN. It is about a 6 or 8 inch tube?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am only giving you the evidence as I have run up against it myself in transmitting mail. There were several of these instances I have mentioned where the mail did not get through in time. On investigation I found it was on account of the envelopes being too large to fit the tubes. Since then we have made the envelopes fit the tubes, and they have had very little trouble.

The delay in the delivery of this mail to the New York banks would cost the different banks and different people throughout the country a great many thousands of dollars in loss of interest, so that it is a matter of great importance that these letters are got through to their destination.

We are so situated that unless the tube is used they are sent by wagon, and the wagons close, as I understand it, on the hour or half hour, and we are receiving items all day for every section of the country, and we have to know the time that a letter should leave Philadelphia to arrive in Chicago at the opening of the clearing house, in St. Louis, and for all the large cities through the country. We have to know that; and, secondly, we hold our letter until the very last minute, until everything can be put into it to be sent to these cities. For the lack of some like device, then, we are delayed. If we miss the half past 9, half past 10, or half past 11 item, we lose the mail.

There is also another case that I had very strongly brought before me, and that is the trains leaving the North Philadelphia Station. The North Philadelphia Station is some 36 squares away from the central banking district. There I had occasion to want to send some letters, and called at the post office. They said it closed at the Bourse at 3 o'clock Well, it was 10 minutes after 3, and there was only one thing to do, to send one of our messengers up there, taking an hour and a half to go up and costing 15 cents in car fare; but if we had been advised and if we had known, as we have since learned, that the tube would have taken it, we could have delivered it at the post office in the Bourse Station at 4 o'clock. The train leaves at 4.37. We dispatched the man about 10 minutes after 3, as there was no other way of getting it there.

Now, the other banking houses in the city are located around the main station, and of that I can not say so much, except that they are forwarding a proportionate amount of mail all day long.

Mr. MOORE. With the indulgence of the committee, before you close, since you have given some very staggering figures about the business done by the Philadelphia Clearing House, I would like you to explain where that business originates. It is not all Philadelphia or Pennsylvania business? Where does it come from?

Mr. THOMPSON. From Maine; San Francisco, Cal.; and from Canada to the Lakes.

Mr. MOORE. You are dealing with all the cities of the Union?

Mr. THOMPSON. We are dealing with all the cities of the Union; yes.

Mr. MOORE. What proportion of outside business is there—about what percentage of the business is outside business?

Mr. THOMPSON. A little more than half, I think.

Mr. MOORE. Outside of Pennsylvania?

Mr. THOMPSON. In other words, the local business is only about half of that done.

Mr. MOORE. We are buying from the other cities, and the interchange of money is practically an interchange of State interests?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is right, sir.

Mr. MOORE. Centralizing in Philadelphia?

Mr. THOMPSON. Centralizing in Philadelphia for distribution on account of the clearing house in Philadelphia not having enacted the rule of charging exchange.

Mr. MOORE. You do not make a charge for the exchange?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir.

CONGESTION ON THE STREETS.

In addition to these statements were others from representatives of all the great trade bodies of Philadelphia, earnestly protesting against the backward move of substituting overhead for underground service. Capt. Mills, chief of the traffic squad of the Philadelphia Department of Public Safety, gave some interesting and convincing statements with regard to the increase of auto mail cars. I append a part of his statement:

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as commander of the traffic division of the department of public safety I was requested to come here by the director to protest against the removal of these tubes, in so far as Philadelphia is concerned, solely from the standpoint of traffic congestion.

The merits of the pneumatic-tube service I know nothing about, I am here, as I said before, solely on account of traffic congestion and, what is more important, danger to pedestrians who use the streets.

A motor vehicle or horse-drawn vehicle traveling from the Bourse Station to the Broad Street Station, from which two points tubes are now in operation, would be compelled to pass through 12 lanes of vehicles crossing at right angles, running from 325 on one street to 1,750 per hour on another street. They would be compelled to pass through eight lanes of pedestrians running from 3,000 to 8,000 per hour.

A vehicle traveling from the Central Station to the Southwark Station or the Philadelphia Hill Station, from which points tubes are also in operation, would be compelled to pass through the most congested portions of our city, through quarters which have a population in a half square mile of as high as 40,000 people, and where through the summer months the streets are literally teeming with children.

The department is constantly in receipt of complaints due to the reckless manner in which vehicles under control of the Government, carrying mail, are operated. During the past year in the city of Philadelphia there were 115 persons killed by motor vehicles; there were 38 collisions in which vehicles in the control of the mail service were concerned; there were 28 persons injured by vehicles while under the control of the mail service.

We estimate that there are about 9,000 vehicles—automobile vehicles—using the streets of Philadelphia. If they were operated with the same degree of recklessness as the postal vehicles were operated last year we would have had injured in the city of Philadelphia 12,000 people.

In regard to the collisions, if the same number of collisions occurred in the percentage with other vehicles there would be 22,500 collisions in the city of Philadelphia. A mail vehicle in the city of Philadelphia, on a percentage basis, is three hundred and twenty-two times more dangerous than any other vehicle operated on the city streets.

Mr. MADDEN. Why?

Mr. MILLS. I don't know why. In justice to the postal authorities, I want to say they are making every effort to remedy that condition.

Mr. STERNERSON. Is it because they run too fast?

Mr. MILLS. Not exactly; also the postal department has maintained in the city of Philadelphia a schedule which causes the vehicle running over that schedule to be operated at as high rate of speed as 52.2 miles per hour in the city streets. That is your own schedule.

Mr. MOORE. Captain, while you are on that, won't you describe the condition as between the Bourse, at Fifth Street, and the central post office, which is at Ninth and Market Streets, and indicate just what would happen if we should remove the pneumatic-tube service from those two points and substitute surface cars—vehicular conveyances?

Mr. MILLS. A vehicle traveling from the Bourse would have to cross Fourth Street, where the traffic runs about 180 per hour; it would have to cross Fifth Street, where the traffic is between 300 and 350 per hour; it would have to cross Sixth Street, where the traffic increases to 500 per hour; it would have to cross Seventh Street, where the traffic increases to 650 per hour; it would have to cross Eighth Street, where the traffic jumps to 1,000 vehicles per hour; and it would have to cross Ninth Street at the post office, where it decreases to 800 per hour.

Pedestrian traffic at Fourth Street averages about 1,500 an hour; at Fifth Street, about 1,000 an hour, and continues up to Eighth Street, where it averages 5,000 per hour. Those are persons crossing from one side of the street to the other, where this vehicle would have to pass through

PHILADELPHIA CITIZENS MAKE AN INVESTIGATION ON THEIR OWN ACCOUNT AND REPORT IN FAVOR OF THE TUBES.

After the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had concluded its hearings and the Philadelphia committees had obtained copies of the report of the Postmaster General's commission, they organized an inspection of their own, to which public attention was drawn. Under date of January 5, 1917, they completed and published the result of their inspection and tests. They take positive issue with the Postmaster General's commission, both as to the facts reported upon and as to the conclusions. I ask a careful reading of this report, since it comes from a public-spirited body which knows what it is talking about. The report is as follows:

REPORT OF TEST OF PNEUMATIC-TUBE MAIL SERVICE IN PHILADELPHIA, MADE DECEMBER 27, 1916, BY JOINT COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA TRADE BODIES.

[Joint committee composed of representatives of the following organizations: Philadelphia Bourse, Philadelphia Board of Trade, Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, Grocers' and Importers' Exchange, Philadelphia Drug Exchange, Master Builders' Exchange, Manufacturers' Club, United Business Men's Association, Hotel Men's Association of Philadelphia, and Philadelphia Clearing House Association.]

PHILADELPHIA, January 5, 1917.

A number of members of the committee appeared before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives at the hearings held in Washington on December 11 and 12, 1916. All testified that they considered the pneumatic-tube mail service a very valuable factor in the rapid handling of first-class mail in Philadelphia, and that the business interests were unanimously opposed to its abolition, and the substitution therefor of mail vehicles traveling through the streets. Numerous cases were cited by various witnesses of the practical use of the tubes in forwarding important business mail to catch certain afternoon mail trains which could not be done satisfactorily if at all by mail vehicles traversing the streets, no matter how propelled.

The witnesses were confronted by statements, quoted by the chairman of the congressional committee, from a report on the pneumatic-tube mail service made by a special committee of postal experts appointed by the Postmaster General July 17, 1915, which committee investigated the service at all of the cities where pneumatic tubes are in use and made report thereon under date of October 13, 1916.

Some of the statements, previously referred to as contained in the report and alleged to be facts, were of a character that if substantiated would justify various deductions and conclusions arrived at by the committee of postal experts. Representatives of the tube companies in attendance at the hearings vigorously disputed the correctness of the statements and of the deductions based thereon.

The particular allegations made by the committee of postal experts which seemed to your committee to be of prime importance in their relation to the efficiency of the tubes were:

First. "The capacity of each tube container is limited to about 5 pounds of letter mail * * *."

The representatives of the tube company claimed a maximum capacity of about 15 pounds, but that in actual daily practice about 10 pounds was the customary load.

Second. "The rapidity of dispatch of tube containers is limited to intervals of about 15 seconds, so that only about 20 pounds of letter mail can be dispatched each minute * * *."

The representatives of the tube company claimed that as a matter of daily practice tube containers were being dispatched at intervals of 7, 8, and 9 seconds at different stations and were transmitting approximately 60 pounds of letter mail per minute.

(NOTE.—Twenty pounds of letter mail means approximately 1,000 pieces per minute; 60 pounds of letter mail means approximately 3,000 pieces per minute.)

The report of the postal experts contained a number of other statements setting forth the disadvantages of the tubes, but none that seemed to your committee of comparable importance.

In order that your committee might be able to speak from actual observation and make a report to you based upon a study of the handling of the mails at several of the offices, permission was sought and very courteously granted by Mr. John A. Thornton, postmaster at Philadelphia, for an inspection by the committee of the methods of handling the mails, inbound and outbound, and by various means of conveyance, at the central post office, at two of the substations, and at the Pennsylvania Railroad terminal.

Pursuant to the arrangements made with the postmaster, a meeting of the committee was called at the central post office for 2 o'clock on the afternoon of December 27. Representatives of the following organizations were in attendance: Ernest L. Tustin, representing Philadelphia Board of Trade; A. B. Clemmer and Robert Morris, representing Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia; E. R. Sharwood, representing Philadelphia Maritime Exchange; Charles Elmer Smith, representing Master Builders' Exchange; William C. Halpen, jr., representing Grocers' and Importers' Exchange; William B. Riley, representing Chamber of Commerce; George E. Bartol and Alexander D. Chiquoine, jr., representing Philadelphia Bourse.

In view of the fact that the Post Office appropriation bill is pending in Congress, it was thought desirable to have the Members of Congress from the Philadelphia districts accompany the committee on its tour of inspection. Invitations were sent to all Members of Congress from Philadelphia, and the following Members accepted the invitation and accompanied the party: Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, representing third district, Philadelphia; Hon. GEORGE W. EDMONDS, representing fourth district, Philadelphia; Hon. GEORGE P. DARROW, representing sixth district, Philadelphia.

After a visit to the postmaster, Hon. John A. Thornton, we proceeded to the main floor of the central post office. The postmaster had appointed to accompany us Mr. T. P. Johnson, superintendent of mails, and Mr. John J. Morrissey, assistant superintendent of mails. The Pneumatic Transit Co. had appointed to accompany us Mr. Kenneth E. Stuart, chief engineer of the company, and Robert Ball, superintendent of the company. The committee was thus provided with experts competent to give full information and explain all particulars of the handling of the mails by different methods.

Careful observation was made by the committee of the time consumed in the dispatch of containers through the pneumatic tubes, both by the line to the Philadelphia Bourse and the line to Broad Street Station,

Pennsylvania Railroad. The former line is a 6-inch line of old pattern, being the first line that was installed in Philadelphia some 23 years ago. The committee observed a large number of containers transmitted by this line at intervals of 5 seconds, which would indicate that this service, if required, could readily transmit 12 containers or carriers per minute. The latter line (to Broad Street Station) is of more modern construction and is an 8-inch line. Quite a large number of containers were dispatched by this line in the presence of the committee at intervals of 5½ seconds, indicating that if necessary this service could be maintained at the rate of 11 containers or carriers per minute. Your committee also observed the rapidity of operation of the 8-inch tube, which runs to North Philadelphia Station (directly opposite the Pennsylvation Railroad Station, known as North Philadelphia). This line is not a continuous line but passes through three substations on its way.

Having completed our observations at the central post office, after an inspection lasting more than half an hour, we proceeded to Fairhill Station, located at Hutchinson Street and Lehigh Avenue. This station is one of the relay stations on the North Philadelphia Station line previously referred to, and the committee timed the arrival and departure of containers which were in transit from the central post office to North Philadelphia. A number of containers or carriers were received and dispatched on this line at intervals of 9 seconds, indicating that in practice 6⅔ carriers per minute were being transmitted.

The committee, having spent about 20 minutes at Fairhill Station, proceeded to North Philadelphia Station to observe particularly the arrival and dispatch of the very important mail which leaves North Philadelphia Station by Pennsylvania Railroad at 4.31 p. m. on the "Broadway Limited," due in Chicago at 9.45 a. m. the following day.

The carriers containing this mail commenced to arrive shortly after 4 o'clock. There were 34 carriers in all, 32 of which arrived consecutively. Carefu' observation was made with stopwatch, the first 10 carriers arriving in 83 seconds; the balance of the 32 mentioned came at an equal rate of speed, indicating the interval of transmission to be 8.3 seconds, or a trifle over 7 containers or carriers per minute. The last two carriers, containing bank mail, followed after quite an interval, but in time to catch the mail pouches before closing. The pouches close at 4.15 p. m. Four carriers were selected by the committee at random as they arrived and contents weighed. Weight of contents of each follows: 8 pounds, 8 pounds, 9 pounds, 10 pounds, an aggregate weight of 35 pounds of letter mail, or 8¾ pounds per carrier.

Assuming the above weight to be a fair average of the capability of the tube and that the carriers were approximately loaded to equal capacities, the 32 containers held 280 pounds of mail, or 14,000 pieces.

According to the statements of alleged facts in the report of the committee of postal experts, these 32 carriers could not have contained over 8,000 pieces. The 32 carriers, however, arrived in a trifle less than 4½ minutes, or, as previously stated, at intervals of 8.3 seconds. According to the report of the committee of postal experts this would be impossible, and they could have arrived, according to their statements of facts, at the rate of only 4 per minute, so that in the 4½ minutes but 18 carriers would have arrived, and the carriers would have contained only 5 pounds of letter mail each, or a total of 90 pounds, equal to 4,500 pieces of letter mail. Your committee found, as a matter of fact, as above stated, that instead of arriving at the rate of 4 carriers per minute the containers arrived at the rate of over 7 carriers per minute, and instead of containing only 4,500 pieces of letter mail actually delivered 14,000 (all estimates of number of pieces are based upon an average of 50 pieces first-class letter mail per pound).

The committee, having spent about 25 minutes at North Philadelphia Station, proceeded to the sub post office under the Pennsylvania Railroad, Broad Street Station. No special timing of tube service was made at this station, but the committee observed that the tubes were in active use and that the rapidity of arrival and departure of carriers seemed to be the same as had been observed at the other stations. The committee further inspected the so-called Terminal Station under the Pennsylvania Railroad structure, where the circular mail, second-class matter, and parcel-post packages arriving from out of town are handled. About 25 minutes were devoted to these two features of this substation.

Your committee also looked at the plant required for the operation of the tubes at the Fairhill Station and at the Broad Street Substation. It was found that quite a large area was required for the blowers or compressors used, but that this space was in the cellars of the respective stations and would not be used ordinarily for the business of the respective post offices. The space occupied for the receiving and delivery of mail by pneumatic tubes did not seem at all large in proportion to the volume of mail handled and the value of the service.

It would be impracticable in this report to go into a number of minor details which were inquired about by various members of the committee, but the final conclusions of your committee are that the primary and most important statements of alleged facts made by the special committee of postal experts, and numbered 1 and 2 in their report of the limitations and disadvantages of pneumatic tubes, were thoroughly and completely disproven by the actual observations of the committee, and are so far from being a truthful statement of the facts as to cause us to regard almost all of the other statements in the report and the deductions and inferences founded thereon with extreme suspicion.

The statement of the committee of postal experts that the tubes are unable to carry special-delivery parcels we consider wholly irrelevant. The tubes are not intended to carry parcels, but first-class important mail.

The criticism as to the loss of time attendant upon relaying containers at way stations on lines between two important terminals infers that the time lost is of serious consequence. Your committee timed the operation of relaying mail at the Fairhill Station and found that it amounted to from 3 to 5 seconds, which would make a total loss of time in transmitting a container from the central office to the substation at North Philadelphia, passing through Station S, Station O, and Fairhill Station, of 9 to 15 seconds, which seems immaterial. This is not cumulative loss of time, but an aggregate applying to a complete transmission regardless of how many containers might be contained in it. In other words, the total loss of time on the transmission of the 32 containers previously referred to from the central post office to North Philadelphia Station would have been only 9 to 15 seconds.

The committee of postal experts criticize what they describe as the inflexibility of the tubes. Your committee feels that the inflexibility applies only to the diameter of the tubes, and that a tube open at both ends is capable of use limited only by the ability of the clerks to feed container into the tube and of the clerks at the other end to remove them; in other words, a continuous service at high speed can be maintained, dependent only upon the supply of matter.

To summarize our views, we believe, based upon years of satisfactory experience and recent observation—

First. That the pneumatic-tube service is an extremely valuable method for the rapid handling of first-class mail matter and that our business interests unanimously desire the continuance of this service.

Second. That no known method of surface transportation can give to the business interests equally rapid or satisfactory service.

Third. That regardless of what speed may be possible by automobiles, physical conditions of congestion place limitations upon speed and that the congestion in the streets of Philadelphia is likely to increase rather than to diminish, and we deprecate strongly a proposal to place a considerable number of additional rapidly moving mail vehicles upon our highways, which will necessarily have to reach the central post office, which is located in one of the most densely congested districts.

Fourth. We strongly oppose the suggestion of economy to be practiced upon the best patrons of one of the best-paying post offices in the United States.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the proposal of the Post Office Department to do away with the pneumatic mail tubes for three reasons:

First, because it strikes at the very roots of the efficiency of the postal service, affecting the business interests of Philadelphia and the convenience of all the citizens of that city.

Second, because the proposal is confiscatory, destroying the property of those who invested their money in the tubes which were constructed at the behest of the Federal Government.

Third, because I believe that the Government should be responsive to the will of the people, and in this instance there is a clear attempt to override the definitely expressed wishes of the people of Philadelphia and other cities.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VARE. I have very little time.

Mr. MOON. I will give the gentleman more time; I have plenty of it. Is there any provision in the bill which does away with the pneumatic-tube service anywhere?

Mr. VARE. You fail to appropriate the money for the system.

Mr. MOON. Does not the gentleman know that the section which has been carried in the bill all the time is carried now in exactly the same language?

Mr. VARE. But the appropriation is not there.

Mr. MOON. That is all; the appropriation is not carried. We have appropriated $456,000 for pneumatic-tube service and the old appropriation has been $976,000. Assuming that the House agrees to raise the old appropriation of $976,000, then tell me how it is possible under the law for Philadelphia to get one cent of that money? I will say in explanation of that question that the law provides that the pneumatic-tube contract shall not be extended until a commission of three or more men appointed by the Postmaster General shall have made a thorough and complete investigation and reported favorably upon the extension at a particular place. Now, outside of the merits of the proposition in Philadelphia the report is adverse to Philadelphia.

Mr. VARE. My colleague and I have construed the intention of the law quite differently from that of the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The objections which have been made to the continuance of the tubes might almost be described as frivolous. Even if it were true that the capacity of each tube container is limited to about 5 pounds and the rapidity of dispatch of each container is limited to intervals of about 15 seconds there would be no justification for discontinuing the tubes. But these figures, as shown by the report of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, are incorrect.

The minority members of the committee, at practical tests of the tubes, have demonstrated that the tubes have an average capacity of from 39 to 51 pounds of letters, or, to be more exact, 1,950 to 2,550 letters per minute instead of the "limit of capacity" of 20 pounds per minute, as stated by the departmental committee which advocates the abolishment of the tubes.

Five previous governmental committees which investigated the tubes sustained their reputation for efficiency and speed and economy. What is the influence back of this move to discredit the tubes? What is the powerful influence which persists in causing investigations to be made after the efficiency of the tubes has been established by experience and the judgment of the business men of the country? Did not the four previous investigations settle the question? Why should they keep on until they found a committee that would decide against the tubes?

The present mayor of the city of Philadelphia, Thomas B. Smith, was for a long time postmaster of the city. He was rated as one of the most efficient postmasters in the whole country. He is a business man, and he put business methods into the post office at Philadelphia. He knew the value of the tubes, both from the standpoint of good service and economy. He recently telegraphed me as follows:

As mayor of Philadelphia and a former postmaster, I urge you to enter protest before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads against the discontinuance of the pneumatic-tube service in Philadelphia. Motor-truck service in connection with the tube would give improved service, and we need it. Anything else means a step backward and a severe blow to our business interests.

THOMAS B. SMITH,
Mayor of Philadelphia.

The whole effort of the times is toward utilizing the undersurface means of transportation. Millions of dollars were spent to tunnel the Hudson River to provide quick transit. Hundreds of millions have been spent on subways in all the large cities to relieve surface congestion. Even the telephone and telegraph companies are spending millions for underground wires.

The streets of all the large cities are becoming congested. At certain times in the day the streets of Philadelphia in the center of the city are heavily congested. The increased use of automobiles is adding to this congestion.

The tendency of the Post Office Department should be to extend the mail tubes and put them into more general use. Any underground system whereby 2,000 letters can be dispatched every minute is worth far more to the business of the country than the Government is paying for it.

The annual appropriation hitherto has been $976,000. The majority members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would cut this down to $449,500, which would be expended for the maintenance of half the service now operative in New York, with the tubes in Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, and Brooklyn done away with altogether.

It would be more modern, more businesslike, and more economical if the Post Office Department were to double the appropriation hitherto made and extend the system in all the large cities where there is congestion. It would help the farmers as well as the city business man. It would give him quicker crop reports and quicker information as to the condition of the markets.

The Post Office Department, significantly enough, has boasted that it has turned a surplus of $12,000,000 back into the Treasury in the past four years. If the public has received any advantage from this alleged saving, I have seen no evidence of it. It is admitted that there is an enormous deficit in prospect in the general revenues; the people are being heavily taxed in all sorts of obnoxious ways. Yet despite all the extra taxes they are paying they are being made to suffer the greatest inconvenience in the one governmental service that is closest to the householder and business man, the Postal Service.

This effort that is being made to kill the pneumatic-tube service is merely a symptom of the growing disregard for efficiency. It is no secret that postal efficiency generally has been declining. Letters no longer reach their destination promptly. Tests have been made in Philadelphia recently which show that where the pneumatic tubes are not used the letters are delayed in reaching their destination.

Instead of approving the proposal of the Post Office Department to abolish the tubes, Congress should give explicit instructions in the appropriation bill for the extension of the tubes and the use of them to their fullest capacity. In no other way, I believe, can the prejudice of the department be overcome.

It is something more than a coincidence that all the business men of the country are in favor of the continuation of the tubes. Sentiment in Philadelphia is unanimous for their retention and extension. Presumably business men know something about business. Presumably they would not recommend anything that would retard good postal service, which is vital to the welfare of the city and its commercial interests.

The reduced appropriation, as I have said, strikes at the roots of postal efficiency; it is confiscatory, as it destroys an investment invited by the Government; it is a violation of popular government because it overrides the plainly expressed sentiment of the large cities which now enjoy and profit by the pneumatic-tube service.

Every commercial organization in Philadelphia has asked that the tubes be continued. There has not been a dissenting voice raised except from the Post Office Department. The case in favor of the tubes has been made out completely and emphatically. I would feel recreant in my duty were I to fail to record myself in strong opposition to this impairment of the postal facilities. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used 9 minutes and yields back 1 minute.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the city of St. Louis has commercially within a radius of 10 miles something more than a million of people. Its streets in the downtown section are crowded during all the business hours. It is practically impossible for automobiles to traverse those streets without great delay. At every street crossing practically there is a traffic policeman whose duty it is to stop vehicles going in one direction or the other.

The central station of the St. Louis post office is located in the business and financial center, at Eighth and Olive Streets. The main post office for the city is located at Eighteenth and Walnut Streets, more than a mile away from the business and financial center. In order that mail may be collected from the business section during the closing hours of the business day and put upon the fast mail trains going out to the East and West it must be sent through the pneumatic tubes. That mail could not possibly be collected and placed upon those trains by automobile service. Tests have been made, and demonstrations of that fact are positive. Likewise mail coming in from the East and the West on the fast mail trains, arriving in the morning hours, could not possibly be placed in the business and financial section of the city so as to be delivered to those needing this mail, in the early morning hours, by automobile service.

St. Louis is peculiarly situated in this respect, because of the location of its central post office and of its main post office, and not one person in the city of St. Louis, post-office official of anyone else, has come forward in these hearings and investigations with any statement to the effect that we could do without the pneumatic-tube service without the greatest possible detriment and harm. We have had sent here petitions from practically every business man, commercial house, and bank in that city protesting against the taking away of that efficient service.

I also call your attention to a letter received from the mayor of the city of St. Louis, as follows:

ST. LOUIS, January 3, 1917.

Hon. L. C. DYER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As mayor of the city of St. Louis, I am writing you to-day upon the subject of pneumatic mail tubes, which, I understand, the Postmaster General is trying to have discontinued in all cities except New York.

I can not impress upon you too strongly that this is a backward step and absolutely contrary to the march of progress. Our city streets are congested so badly with traffic that it has been necessary to provide a number of one-way streets; that is, to allow traffic to move in one direction on these thoroughfares in order to regulate said traffic with any degree of safety.

There is hardly a comparison between the tube and auto service. The tube runs swiftly beneath the surface, while the autos move along the heavily congested streets, endangering life and limb in their efforts to make time. It would be a crime to burden our streets with any more traffic than is necessary.

I will consider it a personal favor if you will vote to retain the service in St. Louis, and, if the opportunity presents itself, to urge that the lines be extended to other points in our business districts.

Sincerely, yours,

HENRY W. KIEL, Mayor.

Mr. Chairman, if the people of St. Louis unanimously want this service and are willing to pay for it, as they are paying for it, why should it be taken away and the great Postal Department, which has been advancing with civilization and with the progress of the people, take a backward step, and deny to the people of St. Louis the facilities that they now enjoy, and that they so sorely need?

Mr. Chairman, we have only 2 miles of pneumatic-tube service in St. Louis. We have petitioned the Post Office Department, and our petition has been indorsed not only by two former postmasters but by the present postmaster, asking for the extension of this service. They have joined in the petitions time and time again asking for an extension of this service, so as to take in three other stations.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the great cities need rapid transit in the collection and distribution of their mail. The service there is different from what it is in other sections of the country. The country sections do not appreciate or understand the importance and the necessity of the pneumatic tubes for the great cities. The people of the great cities pay for this service. The city of St. Louis, through the post office, has paid to this Government during the last fiscal year postal receipts of $5,533,074. Those are the receipts of the city post office of St. Louis for the last fiscal year. Deducting all possible expenses that can be charged against these receipts, including the pneumatic-tube service, and everything else that can in any way be charged up, we find it amounts to only $2,184,122, showing a balance of nearly $3,350,000 to the credit of the Government from the operations of the St. Louis post office. If the people pay that enormous amount to the Government, as they do; if they pay other taxes, including the income tax and the corporation tax, amounting to millions of dollars, are not the people of that great city entitled at least to this small consideration? Here is an item that costs at the present price that we are paying for this pneumatic-tube mail service something less than $34,000, and, when our post office takes in over $5,000,000 annually, can not our business men have this small consideration which they are unanimously asking for?

In all these hearings there is not one protest. There is not one word in the hearings before this commission from any business man, from any citizen of St. Louis, including the postmaster himself, which pretends that this service can be done away with without harm and without retarding the city's progress. The present postmaster himself stated that this service is greatly beneficial. He says that St. Louis is peculiarly situated with reference to the needs of the pneumatic-tube service. Here is a letter from the present postmaster of the city of St. Louis, who says, in part:

The service conditions in St. Louis differ from those of any other city in the country, in that the main post office is located at Eighteenth and Walnut Streets, while the business of the financial section is conducted in the Federal building at Eighth and Olive Streets, nearly a mile away. The tube is a great convenience just on this account, as it permits of continuous and speedy connection between the executive division and the financial section impossible of substitution by transportation of any other character.

That is the statement in the report of the committee that made this investigation from the postmaster of the city of St. Louis, and his recommendations have been the same as those of the postmasters of St. Louis for the last 20 years. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in view of those facts, in view of that unanimous decision, in view of the unanimous recommendation of the people of St. Louis, including its three Representatives in this House, I think we should not be asked to go back and take up the old way of doing things, but that we should be permitted to go forward with civilization with the rapidity which commerce and mail demand, if we are to do the enormous business that is increasing in our great city year by year. I trust that this appropriation for the continuance of this service will be allowed by the Congress, and that if there is a charge of too great an amount for the service rendered it will be determined what the correct amount is and a just and fair amount fixed, but that Congress will not ask the people of these great cities to take a backward step in the work they are doing for the whole country. The cities must prosper as well as the country. We have voted for legislation for the farmer. I, as a Representative of a city district, have voted for all the good roads and other legislation that has been deemed to be of interest to the farming sections. I know that the cities can not prosper unless the farmers prosper, and I also know that the farmers can not prosper unless the cities do. They are dependent upon the cities and the cities are dependent upon the farmers. They must work together for the progress and development of our great country and its resources, to the end that the greatest possible success and prosperity may come to us all. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to speak for the great city of New York, because I represent only 18 election districts in that great city, my own district of Long Island being practically a country and suburban one. But because of the fact that many of my constituents, probably half of them, are engaged in active business in the great metropolis of New York, and due also to the reason, beyond dispute, that whatever affects the heart of the Nation's business activities affects, in some degree, every citizen in every district in every State of the Union, I feel it incumbent upon me to rise here and protest against any action on the part of the Post Office Department which might restrict or deprive our great city of the pneumatic-tube service which has rendered such great benefit during the years it has been in operation. I view the matter not in the narrow light of sectional advantage but in that broad spirit of nationalism which spells advancement and benefit to all parts of the country.

New York is your city as well as ours; you have contributed to her greatness and are affected by her barometer of trade. The postal facilities of the city are nearly as important to you as to us, for the great bulk of the mail handled in the New York post office is interstate in its nature. The advantages of the tube system in New York are felt throughout the entire postal service of the Nation, for it makes possible later and more expeditious transmission of foreign and domestic mail, interstate as well as intrastate, both incoming and outgoing.

The pneumatic-tube service is a physical expression of the evolution of the times. It means speed in the transmission of the mail; and rapidity in the transmission of commercial communications means success to the man who possesses it and failure to the man who has it not. I desire to recount an experience which was related to me by a personal friend in reference to transit upon the streets of New York about three weeks ago. My friend in an automobile endeavored to go from Eighty-eighth Street to Forty-second Street upon Broadway. On account of the congestion of traffic at that time—and it is not an unusual condition—1 hour and 15 minutes were consumed in making the short trip. Mail wagons, while certain traffic concessions are made them, are also subject to delay caused by the congestion of our streets.

It has been contended here that the pneumatic-tube service, if abandoned, would only mean an increase of 1½ per cent, perhaps, in the number of automobiles now used upon the streets to carry the mail at present transported through the tubes. Whether it is 1½ per cent or 10 per cent, any increase in the traffic upon the streets of New York is a direct disadvantage to our people and a direct danger to every man, woman, and child who uses those streets. Every effort to-day should be made to take away from the streets all of the transportation that we possibly can, and we should not increase it by even 1 per cent.

I understand that the pneumatic-tube system of the greater city consists of approximately 27 miles of double 8-inch tubing, and that there are transmitted daily through the medium of this service about 80,000 containers carrying some 5,000,000 pieces of first-class mail. Let me here quote from Mr. Morgan, the postmaster of New York:

Each carrier has a capacity of about 450 ordinary-size letters, or about 250 large-size letters. These carriers are dispatched at the rate of six and four per minute, respectively. The tubes are operated from 4 a. m. to 11 p. m. The carriers travel at the rate of 30 miles per hour. The contract price is $17,000 per mile annually.

On the question of the price paid for the service, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter. It was a competitive bid.

Let me quote again from Mr. Morgan:

It is the opinion of this office that the continuance of the entire existing system of the pneumatic tubes in this city is justified because of the rapid service which it provides for the transmission of mail of the first class. If the tube service was replaced by wagon service it would, I believe, be far from satisfactory, and would result in overwhelming complaint from the public and adverse criticism of the service.

New York is located in what may be termed the snow belt, and while our winters are not severe, it frequently happens that transit on our streets is seriously disorganized by snow and ice. This means that during these periods the schedules of the screened-wagon service have to be rearranged to meet the conditions. In order to make connections with the railroads a "headway"—in some cases as much as 30 minutes—has to be made, thereby curtailing the time of mailing letters by just that much. I understand that in March, last year, mail wagons missed 150 connections with mail trains. The pneumatic-tube service is not handicapped by the weather.

From testimony of Mr. Morgan from 60 to 70 per cent of the total mail handled in New York is carried in the tubes, and 85 per cent of the first-class matter is transmitted in the same way.

Mr. Chairman, in view of all the testimony that has been presented by the great business organizations of New York, supported by the statement of its able postmaster, we plead for a rapid and delay-free transmission of our mails. Upon it depends the prosperity of business and the convenience of commerce. The necessity of trade warrants it, and the security and safety of our citizens upon the streets demands that the pneumatic-tube system shall not be supplanted by surface transportation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the recommendation of the Postmaster General, it is not his purpose to discontinue the pneumatic-tube service, certainly not south of Forty-second Street, and not even north of it.

Mr. BENNET. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. BENNET. The Postmaster General is keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. He has put out an advertisement under which no man can bid, and when the bids are opened there will not be a single bid for the pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not?

Mr. BENNET. Because no sane man would bid on a proposition involving millions, where the Postmaster General can step in at his whim at any time on six months' notice and discontinue it.

Mr. HICKS. That is the point.

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly it is not the plan to discontinue the service in New York City.

Mr. HICKS. I do not want to say that it is the plan to discontinue the entire service. I contend that no portion of it should be discontinued.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman wish to advocate some proposal here that we should direct the Postmaster General as to the method of administering the Postal Service so far as the pneumatic tube is concerned?

Mr. HICKS. No; but I do not think that this Congress or the Post Office Department should countenance any such unbusinesslike method as asking for contracts for a pneumatic-tube service which by reason of the restrictions will prevent reliable concerns from making contracts.

Mr. STAFFORD. We should leave it to the Postmaster General to determine the means of carrying out the contracts.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] desire to use any of his time now?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to discuss this bill except some of the new features which are subject to a point of order, and I desire to give notice now if any gentleman wants to make the point of order upon any such features of this bill that the point will be conceded at once, and that the committee will resort to the rule to put that section in order, or will resort to the introduction of a new bill covering those sections or perhaps will adopt a more efficacious method of letting the Senate exercise its prerogative of doing all the legislating for the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman is giving notice that a rule will be brought in to pass certain provisions that are subject to the point of order?

Mr. MOON. A rule has already been introduced. What action the Committee on Rules will take upon that I am not able to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman invite Members to say whether they will make the point of order?

Mr. MOON. No; I am just warning gentlemen that if they make points of order on these questions that will save the Government money and will advance the facilities of the Post Office Department, they must do it at their own peril. If they want to get into the RECORD to show their knowledge of the law and what constitutes a violation of the rules under the present bill, the question is for them and not for the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman suggested that Members were expected to give notice now. I will say to the gentleman that unless there is a rule points of order will be made against one or two of the paragraphs of the bill.

Mr. MOON. I am aware that during the progress of this bill it will be, now as it has been heretofore, that somebody will have objections and probably make points of order. If it was not in the House of Representatives and a violation of the rules, I would say a good deal more about those points of order that will be made upon measures that will save this Government money and prevent the corporations from plundering it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Still, in spite of that statement, points of order will be made against one or two paragraphs of the bill.

Mr. MOON. I do not care if the gentleman makes it against all. I am telling the gentleman what course the committee will pursue in the event they are made. We may let you assume the responsibility and not ask a rule; we may offer a new bill on these questions, or, as I said, we may let you continue to abrogate your powers and submit subserviently to the Senate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I rose merely because I thought the gentleman invited the membership to comment on the subject.

Mr. MOON. I did not. I was addressing the House. I was not inviting anybody to take up my time. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Chairman, this is the largest bill that has yet been introduced to pay the expense of any department of the Government in the history of the United States. The last bill carried a sum of $322,937,679. The estimates of the Post Office Department for this year were $325,355,820. This committee has recommended appropriations to the amount of $329,353,120.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. This, of course, is the largest appropriation bill that has been provided, but in proportion to the receipts of the department is it larger than others?

Mr. MOON. I will explain that as I go along; of course not. I am not referring to it as the largest appropriation bill to demonstrate that the appropriation ought to be any less. My judgment is that the appropriations will continue annually to be larger and larger according to the necessities of the Government for postal facilities. I said on the floor of this House 15 years ago that I believed in 20 years this appropriation bill would amount to five hundred millions of money. I believe now if you give the American people the facilities to which they are entitled that this bill to-day, which carries in round numbers $329,000,000, will carry perhaps over $500,000,000 in 10 years more. I may say in that connection, Mr. Chairman, that while the bill is an enormous measure in its figures yet it does not cost the National Treasury 1 cent. The Post Office Department earns every dollar of the appropriation and in the last fiscal year it not only earned the appropriation of the $322,000,000 and more, but it earned a surplus of $5,700,000, which they paid into the National Treasury and for which the Postmatser General holds the receipt of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

Now, on account of the diversion occasioned by the gentleman I want to say that there has been question as to the reality of that surplus. It has been questioned whether it is a genuine surplus or not when all the bills payable and all the bills receivable from that department were accounted for for the fiscal year. I ask leave to place in the RECORD here as Appendix A a statement of the grants of money from the Treasury of the United States for the Post Office Department and the return of money, so as to show that for the last nearly four fiscal years now the Government of the United States has earned the vast sum of money that has been used for the Postal Service and the large surplus of which I have spoken in addition. Also, a statement as Appendix B, showing Treasury statement of deficits from 1905 to 1917. I will attempt to demonstrate later on in this debate that if the membership of this House is consistent and has the courage to stand up against the demands of the employees of a nation, if it has the courage to strike down the insidious and infamous subsidies in the law that, with the legislation accomplished in reference to the railroad situation in the last bill, the Treasury of the United States will be enriched by the earning of this department more than twenty millions of money as a surplus. But I shall speak of that a moment later.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the insertion of the statements indicated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statements follow:

APPENDIX A.

WILSON-BURLESON ADMINISTRATION.

The audited surpluses for the fiscal years 1913, 1914, and 1916 were $14,716,350.03. From this should be deducted the audited deficiency of 1915—deficiency due to the European war—amounting to $11,333,308.97, thus showing a net surplus of $3,383,041.06 for the four-year period of the Wilson-Burleson administration. Of the total audited surpluses, $12,500,000 has already been paid into the Treasury for the general uses of the Government. The surplus of 1913 was the first actual postal surplus for 30 years—since 1883, in the time of Postmaster General Gresham. Postal surpluses have been shown in three of the four fiscal years of the Wilson-Burleson administration.

ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION.

The administration of President Roosevelt covered the fiscal years from 1905 to 1908, inclusive. There was no postal surplus in either one of the four years of that period; on the contrary, the audited deficiencies for that time amounted to the startling aggregate of $48,739,639.34, while the actual grants from the Treasury to the Post Office Department, less repayments, during this period reached the total of $48,255,975.14.

TAFT ADMINISTRATION.

The four years from 1909 to 1912, inclusive, covered the period of the Taft administration, during which time, as during that of his predecessor, Mr. Roosevelt, an audited deficiency was shown at the close of each fiscal year. The audited deficiencies in the four years of Mr. Taft's administration amounted to $24,927,657.40, while the grants from the Treasury to the Post Office Department, less repayments, aggregated $29,431,055.33.

The total audited deficiencies for the eight-year period of the Roosevelt and Taft administrations was $73,667,296.74, a yearly average deficiency of $9,208,412.09.

TAFT ADMINISTRATION.

Audited deficiencies, 1905, 1906, 1907, and 1908	$48,739,639.34

Grants from Treasury, less repayments, during this period	29,431,055.33
Total grants from Treasury under Taft and Roosevelt	77,687,060.47

No surpluses during either one of the eight years of the Taft and Roosevelt administrations.

Audited surpluses, 1913, 1914, and 1916	$14,716,350.03
Deduct audited deficiency, 1915	11,333,308.97
Net surplus for the four-year period	3,383,041.06
Of the audited surpluses there has been paid into the Treasury	12,500,000.00

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,

APPENDIX C.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, January 6, 1917.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: In response to your request for information with respect to the loss incident to the handling and transporting of mail matter of the second class, I have to say that the Hughes Commission, created in 1911 under a joint resolution of Congress to investigate the subject, found that the cost of handling and transporting such matter mailed at the cent-a-pound rate was approximately 5½ cents a pound, exclusive of certain expenses, principally for services in post offices, which, because of the limited information regarding them the commission did not assign. The department's estimate of the cost of handling this matter, including the expenses which the commission did not assign, was approximately 8.27 cents a pound. On the basis of the department's estimate, which includes the unassigned expenses, the loss incident to handling and transporting second-class matter during the fiscal years 1913 to 1916, inclusive, would be as follows:

Fiscal year.	Pounds mailed at cent-a-pound rate and free in county.	Estimated expense of handling and transporting.	Amount of postage received.	Estimated loss in handling and transporting.
1913	1,057,607,512	$87,464,141	$9,975,470	$77,488,670
1914	1,088,686,120	90,034,342	10,269,013	79,765,329
1915	1,109,285,785	91,737,934	10,471,442	81,266,492
1916	1,202,470,676	99,444,324	11,383,530	88,060,794

The estimated loss as above shown would no doubt be somewhat reduced because the cost of transporting free-in-county matter is somewhat less than the cost of transporting matter mailed at the cent-a-pound rate, and also on account of economies and improvements in the service, etc. These differences, however, are not believed to be of any considerable amount.

By direction of the Postmaster General.

Yours, very truly,

A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I expect to demonstrate before the general debate is over that instead of earning a surplus during the last four years the Post Office Department has run behind when they have paid all their bills, that they are in the hole now.

Mr. MOON. Well, if the gentleman will show that it is upon a tissue of the most damnable lies ever presented on earth. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEENERSON. I will show it upon the figures of the Treasury Department, presided over by a Democrat.

Mr. MOON. I have the figures, as I said a while ago, which show the fact, and this fact still remains, that the Post Office Department for its services of this fiscal year does not owe a dollar anywhere to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will show it owes $1,400,000 to the railroads for the increase of parcel post, according to Mr. Praeger, and $3,000,000 to the rural carriers on account of deferred salaries which have not been paid——

Mr. MOON. We will account for all.

Mr. STEENERSON (continuing). And they are in the hole. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman will be borne out by the facts if it is true. The facts as they appear from the Treasury Department and the Post Office Department show that that statement is not true. There is one thing——

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. MOON. I will not yield to the gentleman now. Here is one thing that any man who has common sense ought to know: If the balance of accounts is made between those two departments of Government and settled, and the Post Office Department pays in actual cash a surplus of $5,000,000 or more to the Treasury, with all the accounts balanced, with all the bills payable and all bills receivable accounted for, it shows that there is a surplus.

Now, of course, Mr. Chairman, if the Post Office Department were to be charged for the rent of public buildings of the country and expenses of that character, which has never been charged with a debt of that kind, then the department, perhaps, would be behind, though there should be taken into consideration the amount chargeable for penalties and franking privileges, which might balance off this charge.

Those two items have never been counted up.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to raise any disturbance about this question of surplus. It certainly ought to be a matter of gratification to any man who has a decent regard for the interest and welfare of his country that a surplus has been earned, if it has been earned, and if it has not been earned surely it ought to be acceptable to any gentleman to know wherein the statement is wrong. Any man can take figures and pad them. Any man can make assumptions, if he wants to do it, but when the accounts between two great departments are closed and the cash paid over to one or the other, that is a settlement that every man will acknowledge who has not too much partisanship to see the truth or too little inclination to observe the truth when he sees it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. No; not now.

Mr. Chairman, I should explain, perhaps, the reason why this bill carries a larger sum than the amount suggested in the expenditures by the department. We have made a little table in the report that shows the increases and decreases. I will not go over all of them, although there are about eight in all, but the main one is an increase of some $4,000,000. The Post Office Department recommended for the Rural Free Delivery Service $49,000,000. The last bill carried $53,000,000. The committee—a majority, at least, of the committee—thought that the same amount appropriated for the Rural Service last year, of $53,000,000, should be carried this year, notwithstanding the department thought it could save about $4,000,000. The reason for that was that there was no desire on the part of the committee to have a deficiency in this item. It was desired that that service be carried out completely and effectively. Fifty-three million dollars did it last year, with an unexpended balance. Now, it is not necessary, of course, if the department can administer this service for less money than $53,000,000, that it use all of it, but it has been made available for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And it was suggested, was it not, Mr. Chairman, that if, in the management of the Rural Delivery Service, the department is able to save any part of the $4,000,000, which it was suggested should not be appropriated, that all such saving should be used for the extension of the Rural Delivery Service?

Mr. MOON. Yes; that was the idea that the committee had, and I am obliged to my friend for the suggestion in connection with the view I have expressed about the matter.

I am not making, as you will readily observe, a connected speech in any way upon this question. I am going to talk about these matters, as they may be suggested by the Members of the House or as they may occur to me, for a few moments.

Now, in this connection it may be perhaps proper for me to say something about the rural service. We are now paying on 43,000 routes, I believe, a maximum salary of $1,200 for a 24-mile horse-drawn vehicle route. Of course, in proportion to the length of the route, under the terms of the law there is a gradual scale of wages. This committee has not attempted in any way to change that provision carried in the last appropriation bill, the law of the land as it is now. That law remains untouched by this bill. But the committee saw the necessity of some economy in this service, and they felt that a great economy could be effected by the creation of routes upon which automobiles were to be used from 24 to 48 or 50 miles in length. We were aware of the feeling in the House on the question of the change of the routes to the automobile service in the United States. There is a great part of our country where the automobile can not be used for the whole year around, and where it would be impracticable to establish that kind of a route. This bill, therefore, provides that automobiles may be used on the routes of from 24 to 48 miles, where, and only where, that service can be rendered every day in the year. And they have provided for a salary not in excess of $2,000 per annum for the carrier using the automobiles over this route and furnishing his own equipment. You will see at once that the effect of that will be in the part of the country where this service can be used successfully every day in the year the doubling up of some routes. That, of course, is going to dismiss a few hundred carriers. Preference will be given to those who have made the best record. I know it is going to hurt very much some gentlemen to think that they may lose a carrier here and there, and some are so attached to the carriers that they will shed tears even if they lose them in districts that are not their own. But a real economy is effected by this service. It is a sensible method, in my judgment, of adjusting this service to the needs of the country, to the patrons of the office, and to the interests of the Government. Of course, a route that is 48 miles long, for which you pay $2,000, is much cheaper to the Government than two of 24 miles in length for $1,200 each—a saving of $400. When it runs over a thousand or two routes it amounts to much. Now, that section is possibly subject to a point of order, also. If any gentleman in this House feels that he wants to take the responsibility of making a point of order against that section, of course it is his right. My own judgment is that, while the section may not be perfect, it is one that ought to be submitted to this House and the Committee of the Whole for its consideration, without a point of order, with such amendments as the House may see fit in order to perfect this system. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is all I wanted to say on the subject of the rural routes.

Now, I want to talk a little about——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question before he leaves the subject of rural routes?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the purpose of establishing a motor or automobile route?

Mr. MOON. The purpose of establishing an automobile route, or routes of more than 24 to 50 miles, is this: You will have the mail carried quicker than you will by the old method, and you will carry it cheaper than you do by the old method, and you give the same facilities and the same accommodation to the people the year around, because the provision is that it shall be used only where it can be effectively used for the year around.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, in those States or places where an automobile can be used on a 24-mile route, and they can do the work quicker, does that affect the pay?

Mr. MOON. I do not think it affects the pay at all. It does not affect a single carrier now. There is no change in the old law. The purpose simply is to double up some routes where they can be effectively used the year around with an automobile and save some money. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the carrier would be entitled to his extra time if he used his automobile on a 24-mile route?

Mr. MOON. Of course. We do not interfere with that at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has the committee made an estimate that the chairman can give to the House of what would be the probable saving by the establishment of a motor service on all practicable routes?

Mr. MOON. No; but the Postmaster General estimated that by the establishment of the law that I have just discussed as to the new routes and the other economies that may be practiced under the existing law with reference to rural routes a saving of something over $4,000,000 per annum may be made.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That much may be saved?

Mr. MOON. Yes. But I am aware, gentlemen, that I am discussing with some difficulty a question where the Membership of the House has had a feeling that was not altogether kindly to the department on account of some changes, some of which may have been unfortunate, and I am aware, too, that I run counter to the suggestions of those gentlemen who feel that the patrons along the route ought to be permitted to say to the Government what changes should be made and what should not be made. That you did in the last bill. You have actually brought before this country the ridiculous proposition that a great department of the Government shall make no changes in these routes with reference to this service until a majority of the patrons of a particular route demand it.

Now, that, if it had not been an act of Congress, would be said by almost anybody to be pure demagoguery; that is all. The department ought to have control over this under reasonable and sensible laws enacted by Congress. That provision that I have just spoken of would be repealed—I want you to know the facts, because I do not want you to vote in ignorance about it—if this provision is carried into effect. I did not intend further to discuss this matter; I went back by reason of the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who rose to make an inquiry of me a moment ago.

There is another matter concerning which there is a great deal of feeling.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he gets away from the rural carriers?

Mr. MOON. I am trying to get away from the rural carriers, but I will yield to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELVERING. On page 25 it says, "Rural carriers shall receive a salary not exceeding $2,000 per annum, and their maximum salary shall be based on the length of their routes, the time required to serve them, and the number of pieces and weight of mail transported."

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. Very well. Then it says, "The minimum compensation of rural carriers shall be as follows: On routes of 24 miles and over, six times a week, $1,200 per annum."

Mr. MOON. Yes. That is the present law.

Mr. HELVERING. Then a 30-mile route is not affected by this?

Mr. MOON. Oh, no. It does not affect the old law at all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was remarking that there was another matter of very great interest to gentlemen here from the cities of Chicago, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and Boston. I sympathize with those gentlemen in their efforts to sustain the judgment of a portion of the people of their cities. While it may be a matter of regret that a gentleman in his capacity as a Representative upon this floor must so localize himself as to support a measure that is not in the interest of the whole American people, let us discuss the question a little—and I am not going to discuss it minutely. There is a report, a copy of which I hold in my hand and exhibit to you. You see the size of that volume. Gentlemen have said that there has been no sufficient investigation of this question. Here is a report made by five post-office officials on the question of pneumatic tubes in those cities. There is every fact in connection with the whole service. That is a report of 224 printed pages the size of an ordinary magazine. There are the maps of the cities. There is a calculation as to the cost of the transportation and the handling of the mails in those cities. There are the tests of the pneumatic tubes in those cities. There is a comparative test between the automobile service and the pneumatic tubes. There is the law bearing upon the question. And here is another volume which I submit to you, a volume twice that size, containing the hearings had before this committee of the representatives of those cities upon that question.

Now, I am going briefly to state the conclusion that we reached from that proof, and I believe that a careful reading of it all will bring the same conclusion to any unprejudiced mind. First, take for a moment the consideration of the question of tubes.

When the law was first passed and went into operation in Philadelphia and other cities the suspicion arose that the Government of the United States was paying a very large sum for a service that was not very valuable. I have forgotten the date, but I recollect very well that I made a motion on this floor myself to strike from the appropriation bill the appropriations for the pneumatic-tube service. The facts were given in 1901. It was upon this report, I think, that the House struck out that provision. We were without the pneumatic-tube service in those cities for a time. Then another law was enacted for the re-establishment of the tubes, giving the power to the Postmaster General to make term contracts for this service.

What happened under that law? The tubes were established in the cities that I have named. The price paid was $17,000 per mile per year for the operation of those tubes, and this report shows the number of miles in operation in all those cities. Well, what part now of the mail of the United States is carried in these tubes in those cities? The letter mail is about one-twelfth of the weight of all the mails, and the tubes carried only 60 per cent of that one-twelfth, for which we are paying $17,000 a mile each year; and the automobiles can carry in the same cities, as this proof shows, that mail for from one-third to one-half what it costs the Government to carry it through the tubes.

Can it carry it quicker? The proof is, in many instances, that the automobile service is the quicker, because of the various stoppages in the transfer of the mails through the tubes to and from the post office, and particularly the crooked routes of transportation you get by the tubes in some of those cities.

But a great contention is had that the tube service is the quicker. It is not suggested for a moment that it is the cheapest, because it costs two-thirds more than the automobile service. But they say it is quicker. The demonstrations of the department show that in all of the cities, except the city of New York, the automobile service is the quickest, and there is no contention by the gentlemen of the other cities that they have quickened it by tubes beyond three or four minutes.

Let us concede, then, that the department is wrong when it says the automobile service is the quickest. Let us agree that the tube service is the quickest by three or four minutes. Then what follows? Are you to pay for the difference of between a third and the whole $17,000 a mile for the expedition of mails to the extent of three minutes in cities that have 9 and 11 deliveries of mail a day? It is an absurdity for you to talk about it. Think of it, 9 and 11 deliveries of mail a day; and because the tube could deliver it two or three minutes sooner than the automobile this vast difference must be paid! I am going to speak plainly about this. I spoke plainly at the time the motion was made to strike down this new service to begin with, although it has been revived by law. It has from the very beginning been a service not justified in view of the needs of the Government or in view of its exactions upon the National Treasury. What? Three minutes' time saved, at a cost of $10,000 a mile, in six or eight cities which have 58 miles of tubes! Three minutes saved! Are you to pay that for it? Why, gentlemen, in your districts—of course, they are not as important as these great cities—there are places where the people do not get their mail three times a week. Is the country to pay this amount to avoid a delay of two or three minutes in the delivery of the mail where they have 11 deliveries a day? You see the fallacy of such a suggestion. But they have gotten used to the enjoyment of special privileges. They are inured to the wrong that they feel gives benefits to them, a wrong and an injustice to your whole country, and it is hard for them to let loose. I understand that. I understand, and have some sympathy with, gentlemen whose friends persist in the maintenance of a policy that is ineffectual so far as Government needs are concerned. But the law provides that the Postmaster General, after the expiration of the contract for the service of 10 years, shall not advertise for the continuation of this service—and that law was made for the purpose of meeting just such cases as this—until a committee of not less than three postal officials shall have been appointed by the Postmaster General, whose duty it is to make a thorough and complete investigation of this service, and shall have reported favorably—mark that provision—before a new contract shall be made. Well, the department appointed the officials. They have made their report, and they tell you that in every city where these tubes are in use, except in New York, this service is of no practical value.

The exception in New York is due to the intense congestion upon certain streets. And even in New York there is a part of the service that they say is not necessary. The law provides that there shall be no contract for the continuation of this service until this report is favorable. The reports in all these cases except as to New York are unfavorable. They tell you that this service is of no practical value. They tell you that in many instances there are great delays in the operation of the tubes. They tell you that the tubes are so small that they can carry only a portion of the letter mail. They really carry only 60 per cent of the letter mail, and they carry no other mail, except some very small packages, because the balance of the mail can go by automobile and reach the office before the whole 100 per cent of the letter mail can be carried through the tubes. In New York, as I have said, the congestion is such that the service is thought to be worthy to be continued, and that report continues it. How are you going to continue this service in the other cities in view of this law? There is nothing in this bill that provides anything in contravention of the present law.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. BENNET. I want to ask for information. Suppose no one bids for this tube service in New York City on Monday next. What do you think it is the duty of Congress to do?

Mr. MOON. It will be the duty of the Postmaster General, under the law, to see to it that that mail is carried, and he will rig up enough automobiles to carry it or carry it on those which the department now has.

Mr. BENNET. Then, as I understand—if I am incorrect, the gentleman can correct me—if no one bids, the gentleman is in favor of abandoning the entire pneumatic-tube service in New York City?

Mr. MOON. Until you can get a bid, of course, you could not do anything else. The mail has to be carried. You can not stop it simply because nobody bids for the continuation of the pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. BENNET. Congress has the power to continue it?

Mr. MOON. Congress has the power to do the whole thing, of course. Nobody is denying the power of Congress.

Now, there you stand in reference to this question and to the law. Suppose you do increase the appropriation, there can not be an advertisement for the letting of the contract, and there can not be any contract unless you see fit to change the law of the land on the subject. Will you do it in view of the facts? I know there are a number of business men who have come before the committee, seeking to make a case which they do not make, and they have proved a certain amount of congestion in the streets of Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and other cities. They have proved the dangers of automobile operation. Well, of course we know that automobiles are dangerous; but in the great cities of New York, St. Louis, and Chicago, is it not a puerile argument for anyone to say that the addition of three or four more automobiles, or twenty-four, a hundred, or more, automobiles operated by the Government will seriously add to the congestion in the streets of those cities so as to be a public menace to use them? Yet that is the position that gentlemen take. They simply have the service, and they want to keep it. It would not do them any more good if they did keep it than automobile service, but they do not know that. It is just like the case of any other man who has something he ought not to have; he wants to hold on to it to see whether it will do any good or not.

Take the city of Chicago. Who would know better than the postmaster at Chicago, a most estimable gentleman, who, I am told, is a splendid postmaster. Of course, he is a Republican. He has been there a number of years. Mr. Campbell is the postmaster at Chicago. He is not biased, as a Republican, in the interest of a policy of the Democratic Post Office Department. Yet Mr. Campbell tells you that these tubes are of no value or benefit in facilitating the mail in the city of Chicago.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Morgan, another estimable gentleman, is of a different opinion, is he not?

Mr. MOON. I will come to Mr. Morgan. I am coming right to New York in a minute.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I will ask the gentleman a question for information. Having in mind the claim in reference to congestion in big cities, would it be possible to increase the size of these tubes so as to enable them to carry all the mail?

Mr. MOON. Unquestionably so. A tube that would be big enough to carry a car, and carry all the mail in it, such as the proofs showed was being constructed in the city of London to-day, would be of very great service, because it could carry it all upon a straight track. But here are tortuous routes, and little 8-inch tubes, which are in some instances the relics of a commercial enterprise that has failed, and they have been dumped upon the Government.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. For information I will ask the gentleman a further question. Would it be possible, for instance in a city like New York, to change this tube service so as to enlarge and straighten the tubes, and get much better service?

Mr. MOON. The owners of them could do that, but the gentleman must understand that the Government rents these tubes. Of course, that might be done.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Would that be involved in the bids bringing about a better tube service?

Mr. MOON. That might be done, but it could not be done under this item.

Mr. MADDEN. It could not be done without having a comprehensive investigation and settlement by engineers of the question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Would not that be the solution of the problem?

Mr. MOON. It might be, but I am not prepared to express an opinion on any public question of that kind without an investigation.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I know the gentleman is very careful, but with his great knowledge I did not know but that he might express an opinion of it.

Mr. MOON. I believe if you had large tubes, sufficiently large, say 9 feet, practically a tunnel, that that would be of very great value.

Now, Mr. Campbell tells you in Chicago that it is not for the benefit of the public service to continue the tube service. Who knows so well as the postmaster who uses the tubes and sees the daily operation of them. In the city of Boston the postmaster, Mr. Murray, a former Representative in this House, gives you a statement of fact that irresistibly leads to the conclusion that they are of no value in Boston.

I know where the sentiment and sympathy arises in this case; it is that in some of these cases people of small means have invested their money. If the Government does not continue the use of these tubes there may be a loss of their money, but the proof before our committee shows that the revenue is largely consumed in large salaries. I would not undertake to say what the profit of these tubes to the holders of them is, because there is a diversity of testimony and opinion in regard to it, but from the knowledge that I glean from the testimony and from a common-sense view of the cost of these things—the material, the payments that enter into the construction of the whole service, although they say they earn only 4 or 5 per cent—the proof will demonstrate, if you read the record itself, that it is about 28 per cent gross, or probably about 14 per cent net.

Now, I do not blame them for not giving it up, but, gentlemen, if you can secure to the people of the United States a good or better service for one-third of the money, are you going to continue the service? That is for you and not for me; it is up to your conscience and your judgment. That is all there is in this question.

In the city of New York, which is the only exception in the report, it is insisted by the committee that made the report—and they made a favorable report, and therefore it becomes the right of the Postmaster General to advertise for service in New York, or a certain part of that service—that the facts show that the automobile would be just as well and that a saving might be effected there but for street congestion. We are giving the benefit of the doubt on all these questions to the city. We are appropriating, in just so many words, to the pneumatic-tube service $456,000, while the appropriation heretofore has been $976,000.

New York is not mentioned, but in view of the law which prohibits the advertisement in any city not favorably reported upon New York is the only city that will get the benefit of this appropriation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know that I clearly understood the gentleman in reference to the advantages of the service in New York. Did I understand him to say that the only difference in time for the delivery of the mail by pneumatic tube or automobile was three or four minutes in favor of the tubes?

Mr. MOON. Three or four minutes. I do not think there is any necessity for it in New York, but I am following the report of the commission. The commission says that the congestion is very much greater in New York than elsewhere, and the only city entitled to the benefits of the appropriation under the law, as I understand it, is the city of New York, because it is the only city that there has been a favorable report upon.

Mr. SLAYDEN. New York, if I understand correctly, is the only city in which there is any saving of time, and that is insignificant.

Mr. MOON. That is right. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to pass to another and more important proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman leaves the question of the pneumatic tube——

Mr. MOON. I am already gone. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to inquire of the gentleman whether the postmaster at Philadelphia has recommended the discontinuance of the service in his city.

Mr. MOON. I do not know whether the postmaster did or not. My recollection is that you in Philadelphia are getting 11 deliveries a day at the Bourse Station, and the balance of the city does not get it. I am at a loss to know why gentlemen of that building are entitled to so many more deliveries than the rest of the city.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The testimony before the committee would fully explain that if I had a chance to get it in the RECORD, but I have not been able to for want of time. It is in the business center.

Mr. MOON. Well, any man who will stand up and talk in favor of that proposition ought to have not only time but eternity. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I could introduce some testimony that would show——

Mr. MOON. Let the gentleman put that in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It will be too late; it will be like the report of the Postmaster General—too late to be useful.

Mr. MOON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to pass to another question, because too much time has already been given to this question of the tube service, a thing which I think is already practically closed.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MOON. Not on the pneumatic-tube business. If it is not on that, I will yield.

Mr. TAGUE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Post Office Department has recommended pneumatic tubes to be installed in the new post office in the city of Dallas, Tex.?

Mr. MOON. I do not know what the Post Office Department has recommended, and I do not care. I know, as a matter of common sense, as a legislator here, that if 40 post-office departments had recommended such a thing I would not vote for it.

Mr. TAGUE. But the gentleman is quoting from the Postmaster General's report.

Mr. MOON. I am quoting from the postmaster who performs that service. I am not going to discuss that any further. I want to get to one other subject which is of vastly more importance, one which is very close to the souls of almost all of you. You are the most unhappy set of men that God ever let live when you are up against the excoriation and denunciation of a newspaper or a magazine. I do not believe a Member of Congress is afraid of war, of pestilence, or famine, but he will run from a newspaper every time. [Laughter.] What have you been doing along that line for the last forty-odd years? It was well known to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that to relieve this country of that most perilous and dangerous subsidy and political power and influence that has infested the land we would have to separate the fight against the railroad corporations of the United States who were plundering you at one end of the Treasury and the publications of the United States that are plundering you at the other end of the Treasury. We could not force through any measure in this Congress or any other that had against it both of these sinister influences against decent and honest government in the transportation of the mails. For 10 or 12 years we fought the special railroad facilities until we drove them away. We demanded a reduction in the railway mail pay, and a few years ago forced down the pay under the old rule some $6,000,000.

In the last Congress because the newspapers were not denouncing you for it, except as they were paid to make that denunciation, you did finally accomplish something. We had to separate that fight. We established the space basis against the old weight basis, and the experiment upon that proposition is now in effect, since the 1st of November, and you are going to have as a result justice to the country and justice to the railroads. Under that law we will not permit an abnormal increase in the cost of transportation. The railroads will receive all that they are entitled to and the Government will be made to pay all that it ought to pay. The Government will not pay any more than it ought to, and the railroads will receive no more than they are entitled to receive. That question is settled. Another question, one that I now present to you, has to be settled before there can be genuine economy in the administration of the Post Office Department, and before the people can reach that to which they are entitled, namely, 1-cent letter postage in the United States. This bill carries a provision for 1-cent drop letters. I say to you that unless you carry that other provision which provides for the increase in the pay of second-class matter you ought not to adopt the 1-cent proposition.

Let us consult about the second-class mail matter. If I can, I want to so reach you that you will understand, if you do not already, the exact facts in reference to the matter. The law of the United States divides your mail matter into four classes. The first class is comprised of the letters and the post cards. You pay at the rate of 2 cents per ounce for your letters. Of course the postal cards are very much lighter and are carried for 1 cent, and it takes so many of them to make a pound that the profits from the post cards are greater. You pay therefore at the rate of 32 cents a pound for your first-class mail, the letter mail, which is the most easily handled mail, though perhaps not the most easily distributed mail. What do you pay for second-class mail? By second-class mail the law means newspapers, magazines, and periodicals published at stated periods. What are you paying for that mail? What are you getting for the carrying of that mail, and what do you pay for the carrying of that mail? You get 1 cent a pound for second-class mail matter as against 32 cents for the first-class. Third-class matter pays 8 cents, fourth class 16 cents, and the parcels post has a separate rate.

The first-class mail matter for which the people are charged by the Government 32 cents a pound yields 85 per cent of the revenue of the Post Office Department. The Hughes Commission to investigate this matter—and it has been thoroughly investigated—presided over by Mr. Justice Hughes, a very accomplished and able judge, reported that it cost the Government of the United States 5½ cents per pound to transport its mail. That commission said that in that calculation they left out other elements that entered into the cost, such as the handling of the mail in the Post Office, because the facts were not before them. Leaving out the most essential element in the cost of handling the mail, that commission reports that it costs you 5½ cents to carry that mail for which you get 1 cent. This question is not a new one, and the administrations for 15 years have recommended changes in this matter. The department shows that it costs the Government of the United States 8¼ cents to carry every pound of this second-class mail matter, for which you receive in return 1 cent. Is it wise that you should carry newspapers, magazines, and so forth, and receive just 1 cent a pound for carrying them all over this continent when it costs you 8¼ cents to do it? Is there any man who has a just sense of duty to his fellow man who would ask him to perform year in and year out a service for which he was paying him less than one-seventh of what it cost him to perform it? Yet that is the exact situation in the United States. I am going to ask permission, and unless objection is made I shall do so, to place in the RECORD an authentic, verified statement as to the losses of this Government in the last four years on second-class mail matter, which I shall make Appendix C to my remarks. The loss upon that matter this year is greater than the total amount of the Post Office appropriation bill the first year that I sat in this House. Four years ago you lost $77,000,000 on this matter. Your loss during that period has gradually increased until at the end of the last fiscal year the loss to the people of this country on the carrying of this matter has been over $88,000,000.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. May I ask the gentleman what percentage of that loss applies to newspapers and what percentage to magazines?

Mr. MOON. Well, it is impossible for me to separate the proportion of magazines. It has not been done, but I think much the greater loss is on the magazines; that is the largest loss. I am going to discuss that in a moment. Mr. Chairman, thirty-odd years ago this second-class matter was 40,000,000 pounds. Under the encouragement of a subsidy law, insidious laws governing this question, that weight has increased this year to 1,202,000,000 pounds. If that increase shall continue, and it is going on, this Government will pay after while as much for this subsidy as it does to the administration of all of this department. Now, there is a reason. Congress rarely acts without reason for something. There is often a natural hidden reason controlling the action of an intelligent legislative body, and that is true as to this body. There is a reason why letter mail, the pay mail, should bear the heavy rate of postage. There is a reason why this second-class matter should bear a very low rate of postage, but there is no reason why the difference between the two should be the difference of 32 to 1.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I should ask him a question at that point?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has stated, if I understood him correctly, that unless the House shall adopt this increase in second-class matter, the zone system, he would not favor the decrease in drop-letter postage?

Mr. MOON. I doubt the wisdom of it because of the fact that unless we provide some means of revenue we ought not in any shape to adopt any measure which might reduce revenue receipts. It might be possible that the drop-letter system might carry itself. I have some suggestions that it may.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was the question I wanted to ask the gentleman. How much decrease in the revenues does the gentleman think will occur with the immediate reduction to the 1-cent drop-letter postage?

Mr. MOON. It has been impossible to make any calculations on that. Of course, it is a matter of conjecture largely, but the supposition has been it would be a few million dollars less for the first year and probably recoup in the course of time because of the additional number of pieces that would be mailed under the new postage.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So the gentleman thinks that within a comparatively few years it might be self-sustaining?

Mr. MOON. It will be self-sustaining in a matter of a few years. But, Mr. Chairman, I was discussing the question of why the difference between the first and second class matter. The immense revenue comes from the first class, the immense loss comes from the second class. Naturally that difference ought not to exist. An orderly state of things in Government would protest most earnestly against it, but in the early history of your country, when there were but few newspapers, and when learning, so far as newspapers and magazines were concerned, was greatly limited, when the facilities of the Government were not what they are, when the means of communication through the country were not what they are, when social conditions of the people were altogether different, it was deemed advisable to give all the aid the Government could give—though I have always and still doubt the wisdom of giving this aid to private enterprise—still it was the policy established by the Government to give aid to various struggling papers and magazines, in order that knowledge might go forth among the people, that the people might be advised of the conditions of Government, that they might know the happenings, and that law and order might be aided. There was much argument for this contention, and I believe there is much yet. I would oppose any measure upon this floor which would tend to strangle the daily or the weekly press of this country. I would oppose the imposition upon it as I would upon magazines, as far as that is concerned, of any unjust burdens, but the time has long since passed when the public must nurture this means of information and learning. They are like the infant industries of the country once justifying Government support. They stand alone. They are to-day, by reason of their power, by reason of the fact that they reach into all the hidden corners of the land, that they bring forth to light all that is wrong, that they hold up all that is beautiful, entitled to consideration. But how much? Are you to continue a bounty for them that depletes your Treasury? Is the difference, of 32 to 1, just? This bill does not propose to take from them the full $88,000,000 loss that is being sustained. We propose not to change the law, either as to newspapers or magazines, from the letter of the present law within a radius of 300 miles of the point of publication.

Now, if you carry at a loss of 7 cents a pound this 1,200,000,000 pounds of literature for 300 miles, ought we not, when called to carry it across the continent, to have at least 1 cent more for every 300 miles of travel that this burdens the Government? That is the proposition of this committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman about this proposition because I have received a good many communications from my section of the country claiming that inasmuch as the most of the magazines are published in the East it is a discrimination against them under this zone system. I want to say I am in sympathy with the position, as the gentleman perhaps knows, and have been for a great many years, but the question has been propounded me and I have received two or three letters in every mail protesting against that feature of it. I would like the gentleman to give me his explanation of the attitude of the committee in reference to that matter.

Mr. MOON. To what feature of it? I did not quite catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I say that I have been receiving a good many communications from the people on the Pacific coast claiming that under the zone system the people on the coast will have to pay more for most of their magazines because of the fact that they are published on the east coast.

Mr. MOON. They do not publish many in the West?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They publish some; yes.

Mr. MOON. The newspaper men may charge a little more. It will not amount to very much more. But, after all, the people have to pay this cost—the magazine people do not pay it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I received a letter this morning—and I am sorry I do not have it here now—from some publication in Chicago, claiming that they had 28,000 subscribers in my State, and saying that if this zone system was adopted they would raise the price of their magazines to the people in the State of Washington and they would have to pay more than those who were nearer the seat of publication.

Mr. MOON. I think it is barely possible that the people would be charged more, and yet magazines do not make their money on subscriptions. They send tens of thousands of them free all over the country. The money they make is on the advertising. It is doubtful whether it would add one cent to the subscription, but if it does it will come out of the people, of course. But it would not be to the interest of the magazine to increase prices and decrease circulation, because this would reduce the value of advertisements.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Do you think a magazine would attempt to discriminate and charge different prices in different portions of the country, if you adopt this?

Mr. MOON. I doubt that. I think probably they would have a flat rate, and the people living near to them would suffer more or as much than the people far away from them.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How many magazines do you think would go out of business?

Mr. MOON. I think it would be a good thing for the country if a majority of them would go out of the business.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I agree with the gentleman. I have received many letters saying they would quit.

Mr. MOON. There is no reason for them quitting under the law. The magazines are not treating the people right. Take the carloads that go out every few weeks from New York, and within a radius of 300 or 400 miles, they are sent by express or freight and distributed by their agents, but the long haul across the continent, that swamps the National Treasury, is given to the Government for transportation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope you will correct it in some way. I wanted to get the view so that I can defend it.

Mr. MOON. I present these facts not an extreme case either way. Just an average case. Listen for a moment. Here are the official figures on January 4, 1917, issue of the Iron Age, weight 4 pounds 14 ounces each:

Circulation		14,000
14,000—4 lbs. 14 oz. each, weight	pounds	68,250
Less, say 10 per cent for those not going by mail	do	6,825
Probable weight of those sent by mail	do	61,425
They pay Post Office for 61,425 lbs. at 1c. per lb		$614
Cost Post Office 8c per lb. (61,425 lbs. at 8c per lb.)		$4,914
Loss to Post Office on this one edition	net	$4,300

This last month the Post Office got out of this publication $614. It cost the Post Office 8 cents a pound, or a little more than that, on 61,425 pounds. It cost the Post Office $4,914 to carry that for one month. The loss to the Post Office on this one edition in this month—the December issue, printed on the 1st of January—is $4,300 net. Their minimum price for advertising is $50 per page. This number has 636 pages of advertising matter, and that at $50 per page would make a revenue from the advertising pages alone of $31,800. The reading matter in this edition is 132 pages. In the name of all that is honest and just shall this Government, upon the plea of dissemination of knowledge and information, carry an advertising medium of 600 pages at a loss in a single month of $4,300 to the American people? And this is only a medium proposition.

Take the Saturday Evening Post. The back page of that paper, as the proof showed two years ago before this committee—every issue paid for by the advertisers—was at the rate of $10,000 for the back page. The inside pages run from $250 to $7,000, every line paying them 84 cents. And yet they are not willing to pay to this Government one-fourth of the cost of the millions of dollars it has cost this Government every year to carry it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the case of the Iron Age, with 14,000 circulation, does not the gentleman think that that circulation of the 4-pound magazine will go right on in practically the same number regardless of the zone system, even if the few subscribers in the far-away West are cut out?

Mr. MOON. I do not know about that; maybe so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Costing the Government just as much and discriminating against the western people.

Mr. MOON. But when the Government has added to the circulation of this paper the cost that will attach to the different zones it will be but a very, very small recoupment of the loss. And still they are opposing it.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of fact, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Washington a while ago as to the discrimination against the far West on eastern publications, as a matter of fact is it not true that the advertising value of magazines is predicated upon the circulation of the magazines and the number of subscribers, and would it not be more dangerous for the magazines to increase their prices to the reader, which would naturally reduce their subscription list, than it would be to send them on at the same rate?

Mr. MOON. Possibly.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Do not the advertisers of the Saturday Evening Post and of the Iron Age, and other publications that circulate by mail, put their advertisements in in order to receive mail replies paid for at first-class rates? If they do not do that, what do they do it for?

Mr. MOON. Of course, there are results from every advertisement in first-class letter mail. That is true; but there are also results, on the other hand, to second-class matter in replies, and that second-class matter in the losses will far outweigh the benefits that come from the first class, if the present policy is pursued and publications increase. I am surprised that my friend from New York should present that argument. That is a fallacy that was exploded in the discussion of this matter about fifteen years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wished to remind the gentleman that the fact was brought out at the hearing six years ago as to the policy of the Curtis Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, which publishes the Saturday Evening Post, the Ladies' Home Journal, and the Country Gentleman. It was stated by a representative of that company that they send for the short haul their publications by fast freight between the office of publication in Philadelphia and Kansas City, and for the dispatch of their publications beyond Kansas City they dump them into the office of the company in Philadelphia, and we pay the high cost and do not get even the benefit of the short haul.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Wisconsin is undoubtedly correct. They give us in every instance the long haul and they take the short ones. Now, let us see about the Saturday Evening Post, just for a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Just a moment, in connection with the statement that the gentleman from Wisconsin made. I have a letter from the Curtis Publishing Co., in which they state that they paid to the Government $681,000 in postage during the last year on 68,000,000 pounds of their publications. Now, the average weight of the Saturday Evening Post is 1 pound, or 2,000,000 pounds per week, or more than a billion pounds a year, whereas they admit paying postage on only 68,000,000 pounds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any evidence of letter which controverts the statement I made as to the policy of the Curtis Publishing Co. to deny the Government the benefit of the short haul by sending their publications by fast freight between the office of publication and Kansas City and dumping them into the mails for the haul beyond Kansas City?

Mr. RANDALL. They admit they send only a small portion by mail.

Mr. STAFFORD. They send the profitable haul by freight and the unprofitable haul by mail.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Wisconsin has used strong terms.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, that evidence has never been controverted.

Mr. MOON. The statement has just been made about the postage paid by the Saturday Evening Post. Sixty pages of advertising in that paper at $4,500 a page would be $270,000, and one year's advertisement, 52 weeks, would be $14,040,000, based on the rate of advertisements that was testified to by the publishers of the Saturday Evening Post in January, 1914. The rate is probably higher now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very evident from these few illustrations that an enormous burden is resting upon the Government in this matter. When it comes to the smaller publications, that will take, as some of them do, 30 or 40 to make a pound, when they are segregated and put in the different pouches and mail bags and carried to the different parts of the country, upon that class of matter there is no telling what the loss to the Government is. The average alone has been ascertained, taking it all together, by the most scientific sources the department would have.

Now, can you or do you justify, under the policy of "disseminating knowledge," or any other policy, the continued conduct of this department at a loss of 7 cents on every pound of such mail it can carry, aggregating—and I want to impress upon you the figures again—for the fiscal year just passed $88,000,000? If you do, is it your right and your privilege to do it? You will be false to the American people, in my judgment, if you do.

This zone system may not be the best. Gentlemen may object to that. It may be perhaps wiser to have a flat rate of 1½ cents or 2 cents a pound. But there ought not to be any objection to the consideration of this question by the House. There ought not to be any point of order made upon it. You ought to come up to the issue and dispose of it. You ought not, in my judgment, to yield on the part of the Government everything in the interest of knowledge and information among the people. These great advertising mediums that do not give information except perhaps in one-fifth of their publications, as in the case of the one that I read, are of no benefit to the literature of the Nation. Most of these magazines that carry fiction carry also fraud advertisements, and even where the advertisements are legal they are of but little benefit to the American people. If you could segregate those magazines or those publications that are issued not for profit but for the elevation of the American people, for the upholding of morality and religion and the upholding of all that is good in the material world for our people, it would be well that you continue to them that encouragement that ought to come from the Government to that class of its citizens who are upholding its highest morals, its law, and its integrity. But I protest against the continuation of a policy that gives the mere advertiser, the mere destroyer of good and wholesome literature, an advantage that you do not give to the public.

You go upon the hustings and tell the people that you believe in equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Every Democrat and every Republican in every campaign bases the foundation of his candidacy upon the proposition that he favors the integrity of the institutions that are upheld by equal laws and equal rights, with special privileges to none. And yet I suspect when this section is reached for its consideration only that some man in this House, without the fear of God in his heart, being moved and instigated by the devil, will make a point of order. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. There are some magazines published by fraternal organizations, not for profit but for information to the members of those orders. What does the gentleman say about those publications of fraternal organizations?

Mr. MOON. Well, if the members of those orders can not bring themselves under the general rule for the public good I think they ought to pay for them. However, it depends on what the order is, whether it should get the aid of the Government. The order may be a good order or it may be a bad order. If you can tell what the order is you may extend the policy to that order. But still the question can be considered. And if in the extension of the policy in the interest of education the fraternal magazines ought to be exempted or held to their present rates it may be well to do it. My point with you is, gentlemen, that this is the time, if you have any regard for the people whom you represent, to take up this question and determine it in their interest.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment excluding from the provisions of this act those fraternal publications which carry less than 10 per cent of advertising matter?

Mr. MOON. I do not know. I never considered that question. If the matter is brought up before the House it is a proper subject for discussion. On the question of disseminating knowledge upon all questions I should not myself seriously object—though I speak only for myself—if the present rates were maintained across the continent upon publications that do not have more than one-tenth of their space filled with advertising matter, provided the other matter is proper for the dissemination of knowledge, I might not object. But it would be a very hard task for this House to undertake to discriminate in that way.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JAMES. For instance, the Eagles' Magazine is published for the information of its members. The members are not charged anything, but each member receives a copy by mail each month. The expenses of publishing the magazine are borne by the Eagles' organization. Just as a matter of information, does the gentleman think a magazine of that kind should be exempt?

Mr. MOON. If any should be exempt, it is possible that kind should be; but I do not subscribe very strongly to the doctrine of making any classes amongst the people to enjoy exemption. I believe that the law ought to fall with equal weight upon all men.

Mr. JAMES. But this Eagles' Magazine is not published for anything except information.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the law as it exists make a distinction in classes? Does not the present law divide people into classes, and carry the products of certain printing presses for a great deal less than the cost of carriage?

Mr. MOON. That may be true; but that is no evidence of its justice or its good effect.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a species of "pork."

Mr. MOON. Perhaps.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But those publications get the "pork," and they do not say anything about it.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. As the law used to be—and I presume as it is yet—first-class letter mail could not be sent by express without the postage being paid.

Mr. MOON. That is right. The Government has a monopoly of that.

Mr. CANNON. Why not have a monopoly on second-class matter?

Mr. MOON. There is no objection to that at all in my mind.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, where they can make a profit by shipping it by freight or express they reap the profit.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. But where the transportation is done at a loss the Government pays it.

Mr. MOON. That is correct. Now, I will say to the gentleman in that connection, I think that is a very sound view of the situation. There are a number of magazines in the United States that are published about two weeks before the date that they bear, and in the last bill we provided what is known as the blue-tag law, by which those magazines may be sent by fast freight, so that they reach the point for which they are intended by the date of publication that they bear. An experiment was made previously by the department in the first and second divisions of the United States, the country being divided into four divisions on that question, and it was demonstrated that under that policy the magazines reached the point of destination at the time they were intended to reach it, and that in one zone about $1,650,000 was gained by the Government by that policy, and in another zone $1,350,000; and in the last act we put the whole country under that system, so that the department now has the discretion, so far as the magazines are concerned, wherever they can be delivered in accordance with the statutory contract—which provides, of course, for delivery by the publication date—they may go by that method.

Now, as I said before, having adjusted the railway mail pay proposition, if we can now adjust this proposition—not to obtain full compensation, but to make the publishers pay at least one-fourth or one-fifth of what it costs to carry this matter; and that is about what it is—we may be able to give to this country 1-cent letter postage.

Mr. FARR. Has the gentleman estimated the additional amount of burden that will be placed upon these publications by the adoption of the zone system?

Mr. MOON. No; but anybody can estimate that in a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. It will cost them 3 cents instead of 1 cent on the average.

Mr. MOON. Take, for instance, that class of papers that weigh 16 to the pound. They go 300 miles, just as they do now, for 1 cent a pound. We add 1 cent a pound to them in the zone 300 miles beyond that, which would be about one-sixteenth of 1 cent for each paper. It does not amount to much separately, but it amounts to a good deal in the aggregate. I have concluded the suggestions I desired to make.

Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] wish to use some of his time?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the result of the action of the Postmaster General, whatever may have been his intention, will be to discontinue the pneumatic-tube service in New York City entirely on the 4th of March. It will be a postal crime, and the mere fact that it may be an accidental crime in no way militates against the atrocity of the result. There is an advertisement for bids for the tube service, which bids will be opened on Monday, and there will not be one single bona fide bid for a mile of pneumatic-tube service in New York City on Monday next. I hold in my hand a letter from the bitterest opponent of the present company, which opponent was asked by the Post Office Department, evidently in a special letter, to bid for this tube service. I shall read the pertinent part of the reply:

ELECTRIC CARRIER CO.,
220 Broadway, New York, January 8, 1917.

Hon. J. C. KOONS,
First Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of January 5 (Ry. SC), respecting proposals for carrying mails by tubes in this city, I regret to advise you we shall be unable to submit proposals under the terms of the advertisement.

I find that banking support can not be obtained under the provision which provides "Each contract shall contain a provision empowering the Postmaster General to terminate and annul the contract on six months' notice."

Nor do I think it would be possible for any company, aside from the company already in the field, to secure a franchise and fulfill the other requirements within the time limit allowed. * * *

Regretting our inability to meet the terms of the advertisement, we remain,

Respectfully,

ELECTRIC CARRIER CO.,
E. R. SUTTON, Secretary.

Mr. HULBERT. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BENNET. For a brief question.

Mr. HULBERT. Does my colleague know the source of the current by which all the pneumatic-tube service is handled in New York?

Mr. BENNET. Not intending to be disrespectful, I do not know, and neither do I care.

Mr. HULBERT. Does my colleague know that it is not possible for the pneumatic-tube company to make a contract for so short a period as six months?

Mr. BENNET. I did not know it, but that is an additional atrocity. The proposition of the Postmaster General is to do away with the pneumatic-tube service everywhere. He did not dare to do it in New York City, and so he kept the promise to the ear and broke it to the hope. And for how much money? Why, the pneumatic-tube service costs $499,500 a year. The additional automobiles that they will have to have, even to get the mail through the streets regardless of delays will cost $280,000. So the Postmaster General proposes to put us back in a horse and wagon stage in New York City for a total saving of $219,500 this year. That is all the difference there is between the cost of the two services.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] inadvertently said that there was only a difference of time of three or four minutes even in New York City. The distance from the station in the customhouse to One hundred and twenty-fourth Street is 8½ miles. The time by automobile—because automobiles go from station to station, and if they had an automobile from every station to every station it would cost more than the tubes—the time from station to station is 2 hours and 31 minutes from the customhouse to One hundred and twenty-fourth Street. The time by the tubes is 46 minutes. In other words, instead of being a difference of three or four minutes, the difference is nearly two hours on that route. Neither did the gentleman mention that other capitals in the world—London, Berlin, Paris, and Vienna—have a pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. For a very brief question.

Mr. GORDON. How many people in New York are financially interested in the tube monopoly?

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman can find the list of stockholders on pages 388, 389, and 390 of the hearings.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield? I am sure the gentleman wants to be right.

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is not citing the record correctly when he says that all of the capitals of the world he mentions have pneumatic tubes. Berlin and Paris and London have little 3-inch tubes, and the only mail that they carry through them is special letters costing 6 cents; they are telegram letters.

Mr. BENNET. I said they had pneumatic-tube service. Now, take the commercial side of it. The Western Union Telegraph Co. and the Postal Telegraph Co. in the city of New York operate more than 50 miles of tubes—3-inch tubes. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] said that an 8-inch tube was too small to be operated commercially. The Western Union Telegraph Co. and the Postal Telegraph Co. are supposed to have good business sense, and they operate 3-inch tubes because in the city of New York they can deliver telegrams through the tubes quicker than they can through our congested streets, and they have twice as much mileage as the Government has.

We propose to do away with all of them for the yearly saving of $219,000 each year, when the Post Office Committee reports to the House a proposition, from which I do not dissent, appropriating $5,000,000 more for rural free delivery than the Post Office Department recommends.

Now, what about the congestion of the streets. We have 140,000 automobiles in New York City. There are street corners in New York City, street crossings, where 110,000 people cross every 10 hours, in addition to the 15,000 or 16,000 vehicles. Every 14 hours in New York City some man, woman, or child is killed by a vehicle. Every 23 minutes some man, woman, or child is injured by a vehicle.

There came before the Post Office Committee the representative of the manufacturers and dealers in automobiles who asked that the tube service be continued because the automobiles already on the streets of New York are at least as many as there ought to be, if, in fact, not more than there ought to be. Now, they propose to add to this a number of automobiles sufficient to carry these letters throught the streets.

What is our mail in New York City? Five million letters a day, 85 per cent of which are carried through the tubes. The gentleman from Tennessee says—and I am not criticizing the accuracy of his statement—that the first-class mail is only one-twelfth of the weight of the mail, but that is a pretty big amount.

By leave of the House I reprint the following, compiled by the Merchants' Association of New York City:

OPPOSING THE ABOLITION OR CURTAILMENT OF THE PNEUMATIC-TUBE MAIL SERVICE IN ANY CITY WHERE IT NOW EXISTS.

The Postmaster General has recommended to Congress the abolition of the pneumatic-tube mail service in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis; its curtailment in Brooklyn, and its retention in New York under conditions which threaten to curtail it by about one-half, and which permit its entire abolition at the discretion of the Postmaster General.

The recommendations of the Postmaster General are based upon a report of a committee of subordinate postal officials, which report embodies the results of an investigation made by the committee as to the relative efficiency of auto vehicles and pneumatic tubes for the transmission of letter mail. Those results seemingly demonstrate that autos equal tubes in efficiency and that the substitution of autos for tubes would effect material economies without impairing the mail service.

This would be true if the facts stated in the report comprehended all the facts, and if the methods used in the investigation had been such as fully to develop and fairly to present those facts; but such is not the case. In the investigation vital factors were ignored or suppressed. By reason of their suppression false inferences were suggested, leading to fallacious conclusions. The utility of the tubes was minimized, and the practicable performances of autos under service conditions was grossly exaggerated. The methods of the investigation, its omission to develop and present essential facts, the questionable character of the so-called tests, and the fallacy of the conclusions inevitable from an incomplete array of facts, were such as to render misleading and practically worthless the report upon which rest the recommendations of the Postmaster General.

Following are specifications:

1. The automobile tests were made under highly favorable selected conditions of minimum traffic congestion, and entire absence of obstruction by ice and snow.

2. The usual and necessary service routes, time schedules, and requirements were disregarded.

3. Excessive and dangerous speed was made through crowded city streets.

4. The results of the speed tests made under exceptional and selected conditions were accepted as representing the practicable speed of autos throughout the year, under service conditions subject to wide variation.

5. The rapidity and capacity of the tubes were understated. On one occasion the operation of the tubes was retarded.

6. Two of the most important and useful functions of the tube service were ignored by the report.

I. THE AUTOMOBILE TESTS WERE MADE UNDER HIGHLY FAVORABLE SELECTED CONDITIONS OF MINIMUM TRAFFIC CONGESTION AND ENTIRE ABSENCE OF OBSTRUCTION BY ICE AND SNOW.

Tests of the relative speed of autos and tubes in the transmission of mail were made in the several cities having tube service, with the exception of New York. All these tests, with three exceptions, were made in the months of July and August. The exceptions were made June 28 and 29 in Boston.

The speed at which vehicles can move through city streets is, of course, materially affected by the extent of the traffic therein. In all the large cities the traffic congestion in the business centers is extreme and creates a condition exceedingly unfavorable to the rapid movement of vehicles. In the city of New York traffic counts were recently made during the months of maximum congestion. It was found that at the 464 crossings where police officers are stationed to regulate traffic an aggregate of about 3,407,000 vehicles and 15,545,000 pedestrians crossed within 10 hours. The traffic at Columbus Circle (1 mile north of Forty-second Street) aggregated 39,000 vehicles and 81,990 pedestrians in 10 consecutive hours. Similar conditions of extreme congestion prevail in the Chicago "loop district" and in the central areas of Boston, Philadelphia, and St. Louis.

But the density of the congestion varies widely at different seasons. In the months of July and August it is at a minimum. During those months shipments of merchandise fall off greatly. Retail trade of many classes is at its lowest ebb, and the movement of delivery wagons is much reduced. A large proportion of pleasure or passenger autos are absent in country districts. These causes greatly reduce the volume of street traffic and correspondingly increase the practicable speed.

In his testimony on this point before the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, Inspector Thomas Myers, the police officer in charge of traffic regulation in New York, stated that street traffic and consequent congestion falls off about 50 per cent during the months of July and August. Similar causes produce a similar falling off in other cities.

It is obvious that speed results obtained in the months when about one-half the usual number of vehicles are absent from the streets do not fairly represent the speed practicable during the remainder of the year.

It is a fact of common knowledge that city streets during a considerable part of every winter are badly obstructed by snow and ice. So far as revealed by their report, this fact seemed to be unknown to the committee of post-office employees. At any rate, no cognizance was taken of it.

The extent to which snow slows the movement of autos and disarranges mail movement was testified to December 14 before the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by Mr. Edward M. Morgan, postmaster of New York.

Mr. Morgan stated in substance that during a considerable part of last winter, because of snow, it was necessary in order to make train connections to allow autos as much as 30 minutes' extra running time, thus more than doubling the usual time. Mr. Morgan specified December 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, 1915; February 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, 1916; March 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16, and 17, 1916, as days when transportation was seriously interrupted by reason of storms, and the mail contractor was unable to meet the requirements of the service and live up to the existing schedules. The effect of these conditions is shown by the following quotations from the records of the hearing:

"Mr. MORGAN. * * * The number of train connections missed and consequent delay to mails during December, 1915, and January, February, and March, 1916, due to irregularities in mail-wagon (auto) service, occasioned by snowstorms and resultant congested and slippery streets, was as follows:

December, 1915	30
January, 1916	8
February, 1916	51
March, 1916	120
Total	209

"The CHAIRMAN. They missed the trains?

"Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; notwithstanding they were given 30 minutes headway.

"Mr. BENNET. You mean you start the mails several minutes earlier?

"Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

"Mr. BENNET. How many—how long a time?

"Mr. MORGAN. Usually about 30 minutes. For example, if we have to make a connection, and our regular schedule is 2.30, we start the wagon out at 2 o'clock; and if we have to make a connection, the regular schedule being 4 o'clock, we start the wagon out at half past 3."

The extent to which snow and ice obstructed the movement of mail vehicles in other cities is undoubtedly a matter of record in the several post offices. It is a vital factor in determining the relative utility of autos and tubes. The committee could readily have obtained the information. So far as the record shows they made no attempt to do so, but completely ignored it.

II.—THE USUAL AND NECESSARY SERVICE ROUTES, TIME SCHEDULES, AND SERVICE REQUIREMENTS WERE DISREGARDED.

The time normally required for mail vehicles to move between post offices and railroad stations and from one branch office to another is definitely and completely established as to every important office. The extent of that time is absolutely and conclusively demonstrated by daily and hourly experience, continued through every day in the year. As a result of this experience official time schedules are established. These schedules govern the movement of all mail vehicles.

The time allowed is that normally consumed by the vehicles in passing over their routes. It considers delays and interruptions to movement occasioned by traffic congestion. It makes allowances for time consumed by stops made at intervening stations for the purpose of receiving and delivering mail.

The time allowance is governed by two imperative factors. The vehicle must remain at the post office until the latest possible moment in order to permit it to carry the latest mails received. The time allowed for movement to its destination must be as short as is practicable to assure its arrival at the station in time to catch the connecting train. It is certain, therefore, that in every post office having a capable administration the time allowed for the movement of vehicles is the shortest time that it is safe to allow, as demonstrated by continuous experience.

In addition to the normal time allowance is the extraordinary allowance made necessary in winter by reason of snow and ice. Postmaster Morgan has testified that under frequently prevailing winter conditions more than twice the usual time is required. We have thus in the records of every post office absolute standards derived from experience of actual service conditions as to the performance of auto vehicles which may safely be relied upon.

The difference between these standards and the results of the so-called tests made in Chicago and Boston are so great as to bring the methods of the latter into question. Mail is daily transported by automobile from the Boston general post office to Uphams Corners over a route which is 4.4 miles long. Mail passing over this route goes first to the South Terminal Station, where it is transferred to another vehicle. It thence moves by way of the South Boston Station to Uphams Corners. The vehicle stops at each of the stations named. At the South Terminal the pouches are rehandled and separated for forwarding to different destinations by various routes. This process requires five minutes or more. An intervening stop is made at South Boston, where mails are received and delivered. The record of movement and distances is as follows:

DISTANCE AND OFFICIAL TIME, INCLUDING STOPS.

General post office to South Terminal, three-quarters mile, 15 minutes.
South Terminal to South Boston, 1¾ miles, 15 minutes.
South Boston to Uphams Corners, 2¼ miles, 15 minutes.
Total, 4.4 miles, 45 minutes.
Average miles per hour under service conditions, 5.86.

In the auto test that was made between the general post office and Uphams Corners the route followed was not stated. If the auto proceeded via Roxbury, the distance covered would be 5 miles. If it proceeded via South Boston, the distance would be 4.4 miles. The time occupied was 13 minutes 50 seconds. In the first case, via Roxbury, the rate of speed per hour would have been over 21 miles. In the second case, via South Boston, the rate per hour would have been over 19 miles.

This result was obviously obtained by ignoring all the service conditions. An average rate of speed more than three times that found possible under service conditions was made. It was in part made by omitting the stops required in the actual mail service, thereby saving the several minutes required to make each of those stops and take and deliver the mail. It was made by sending the auto over portions of the route at a rate of approximately 30 miles per hour (making allowance for the inevitable detention in the area of great congestion).

Similar disregard of service conditions appears in the so-called tests made in the central area of Boston. The official time shown by experience to be necessary under service conditions for an auto to move from the general post office to the South Station and insure train connections is 10 minutes. The auto made the distance in 3 minutes 40 seconds. The official time from the Boston post office to the North Station is 12 minutes. The test auto made the distance in 5 minutes 5 seconds. These figures show the extent to which the relative absence of traffic congestion during the months of July and August influenced the result.

On the one hand, we have the time schedules based upon long and continuous experience, established with due regard to traffic obstacles and to service stops. On the other hand, we have single tests made regardless of service conditions, with the obstacles of traffic congestion largely eliminated, omitting the time required for stops at intermediate stations, and carried on at an unlawful and highly dangerous rate of speed.

Similar conditions obtained in the case of the Chicago tests. The official time upon which autos are daily moving between the general post office and the stockyards, with one stop, is 52 minutes, the rate of speed per hour being 6.92 miles. In the so-called auto test the distance was made in 17 minutes, the service stop required in actual service being omitted. The average rate of speed was over 21 miles an hour, probably reaching 30 miles an hour over a considerable part of the course.

The Postmaster General assumes that the results of these tests indicate the regular and normal speed of the service which can be provided by automobiles. If that be true, the administrative officials of the principal post offices in the United States are convicted of gross incompetency, for consuming in actual service more than three times the time which the Postmaster General appears to believe a reasonable and practicable time.

III.—EXCESSIVE AND DANGEROUS SPEED WAS MADE THROUGH CROWDED CITY STREETS.

It has been shown above that the regular time schedules imposed by contract upon the mail service in the several cities contemplates a rate of speed limited by the congestion of city streets, speed laws, traffic regulations, and similar obstructive conditions.

The public of every large city is in a state of violent indignation and alarm because of the dangerous conditions arising from the rapid movement of automobiles in crowded city streets. The fatalities and accidents from this cause are numerous. In the city of New York one person is killed every 14 hours, and one person is injured every 23 minutes. The problem of preventing undue speed, of protecting life, and of dealing with traffic congestion is one of the most pressing with which city officials everywhere are confronted.

In response to public demand and in the interest of public safety, laws limiting the speed of vehicles have everywhere been adopted. "Safety first" is the universal cry.

In defiance of an earnest and reasonable public sentiment we find the agents of the United States actively promoting highly dangerous conditions. We find the Postmaster General of the United States seriously proposing that those dangerous conditions shall be made the regular and daily conditions for the operation of mail vehicles—that those vehicles shall regularly and habitually traverse city streets with reckless disregard of human life and safety, and shall ignore and override the laws and regulations made necessary for the public protection.

The recommendation of the Postmaster General is based upon the assumption that mails will be transported through the streets by autos at the speed shown by the recent tests. Unless that speed is maintained, the present celerity of mail movement, attained by the use of the tubes, will be materially lessened. That speed is therefore proposed by the department.

The auto speed developed by the tests and accepted by the Postmaster General as a normal standard of performance was as follows:

BOSTON—GENERAL POST OFFICE TO UPHAMS CORNERS.

Distance (via Roxbury. The tubes follow the Roxbury route, with which the auto tests were compared. The regular auto route to Uphams Corners is via South Boston. The distance via the latter route is 4.4 miles. If this route were taken in the auto test, the average rate of speed would have been slightly more than 19 miles per hour), 5 miles.
Time, 13 minutes 50 seconds.
Rate per hour, over 21 miles.

CHICAGO—GENERAL POST OFFICE TO STOCK YARDS.

Distance, over 6 miles.
Time, 17 minutes.
Rate per hour, over 21 miles.

In each of these tests a mile or more of the distance was through an area of intense congestion, in which area only a very slow rate of progress was possible. The official time schedules of the Boston post office allow 10 minutes for an auto to traverse only a part of this congested area. A similar official time allowance is made in Chicago. Allowing for inevitable delays in these highly congested districts, a much higher rate of speed than the average must have been maintained over the remainder of the route.

It is practically certain, therefore, that over the larger part of the routes stated the test autos must have been driven at a rate of speed in excess of 30 miles per hour, through densely populated districts, in defiance of speed laws, traffic regulations, and public safety.

In fact, however, this speed would not and could not be maintained under service conditions, for reasons stated in the previous section. But nevertheless it was advanced by the post-office committee as though it were the normal speed practicable for mail autos; and the Postmaster General and Congress were permitted to infer that this artificial and impracticable rate of auto movement proved that the mails could be moved as rapidly and efficiently by autos as by tubes.

IV.—THE RESULTS OF THE SPEED TESTS MADE UNDER EXCEPTIONAL SELECTED CONDITIONS WERE ACCEPTED AS REPRESENTING THE PRACTICABLE SPEED OF AUTOS THROUGHOUT THE YEAR, UNDER SERVICE CONDITIONS SUBJECT TO WIDE VARIATION.

It has been shown above that the conditions affecting the speed of autos passing through city streets are subject to wide variations at different seasons of the year. It has been shown that the so-called tests of auto speed were made at a time when traffic congestion was at a minimum and an exceptionally high rate of speed therefore practicable. It has been shown that in the tests the usual and necessary service routes were disregarded and that the usual and necessary stops at intermediate stations, involving in the case of each station a considerable time for delivering and receiving mail, were omitted. It has been shown that the actual service time established and shown to be necessary as the result of continuous experience during years is from two to three times that shown by the tests. It has been shown that when the streets are obstructed by snow and ice it is necessary to more than double the usual service time and that even with such additional time many train connections are missed. It has been shown that excessive and dangerous speed was made through crowded streets in violation of traffic regulations and speed laws.

It is obvious that all the conditions recited must of necessity be considered and allowed for in determining the habitual and regular speed of mail autos when carrying the mails under service conditions. It is equally obvious that any fair investigation for the purpose of determining the practicable speed of autos in mail service would have given full consideration to all these limiting conditions and have fully and candidly stated in the report their effect and the extent to which they should qualify the conclusions.

The report of the committee of postal employees is silent upon all of these points. Having made certain tests under conditions which excluded nearly all the most formidable impediments to high speed, they have presented those results as though they were applicable throughout the entire year and as though they could properly be made the ordinary standard of auto performance.

As a matter of fact, the report in question ignored or suppressed the essential facts indispensable to a true conclusion. It is this investigation which the Postmaster General characterizes as "thorough," and upon which, "after careful consideration," he bases his recommendations for the substitution of autos for tubes, on the assumption that the former will provide service equally efficient as that of the latter.

Upon this evidence, which has suppressed the essential and suggested the untrue and misleading, the Postmaster General rests his statement that the department "never at any time has made a recommendation looking to the improvement of the Postal Service which it is more certain is just and meritorious than the proposed action with reference to this pneumatic-tube service."

V.—THE RAPIDITY AND CAPACITY OF THE TUBES WAS UNDERSTATED—ON ONE OCCASION THE OPERATION OF THE TUBES WAS RETARDED.

The capacity of the tubes is dependent upon the quantity or weight of mail matter which can be contained in each of the carriers and the frequency with which such carriers can be dispatched through the tubes.

The report of the committee of post-office officials alleges:

"(a) The capacity of each tube container is limited to about 5 pounds of letter mail, and all classes of mail can not be carried."

In the hearings before the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a standard carrier was placed in evidence. Numerous packages containing envelopes with blank letter sheets of different sizes and thicknesses, and also a proportion of cards similar to postal cards, were produced, weighed before the committee, and deposited in the carriers. Ten pounds of these packages—which were carefully examined by the committee and admitted to be fairly representative of regular mail—were placed in the carrier, which was but two-thirds filled. There were, however, no long envelopes in the parcels, but ample space remained to permit the inclusion of such long envelopes.

The committee's report further stated:

"(b) Rapidity of dispatch of tube containers is limited to intervals of about 15 seconds, so that only about 20 pounds of letter mail can be dispatched each minute * * *."

In the Boston test of the mail carried by train No. 53, June 28, 1916, six carriers were dispatched in 65 seconds, making an average of 10⅚ seconds' interval between the carriers.

As testified at the hearing, the time intervals noted in the dispatch of certain mails by tube in the Chicago post office was found to be less than 10 seconds.

In the New York post office on August 19, between the hours of 7 and 8 o'clock p. m., 838 carriers were dispatched from the general post office through a single line of tubes, the intervals between the dispatches being about 4¼ seconds.

In view of these well-established results, it is obvious that the committee's statement that only about 20 pounds of letter mail can be dispatched each minute is incorrect. The facts cited, however, are advanced only to show the loose methods and the loose statements of the committee. It is correct to state that the service intervals between the dispatch of tubes is in usual practice about 15 seconds, although the tube is capable of greater expedition. The actual speed, however, is dependent upon the celerity with which mail is prepared for dispatch by the postal clerks. When the postal clerks are slow or insufficient in number the intervals become greater. The actual quantity carried by the carriers is likewise affected by the speed with which the clerks prepare the packages and the number of letters contained in such packages.

While, therefore, the tubes are capable of moving mail at a much higher rate of speed than that stated by the committee, and while each carrier will contain more than twice the weight stated, the average, under service conditions, is probably approximately correct. This, however, is no excuse for the bald statement of the committee that the capacity is actually limited to the amount and the time stated.

On Sunday, July 30, a test was made in Boston of the rapidity with which the tubes would handle the mail arriving by train No. 30. Seventy-seven carriers were dispatched in 34 minutes 38 seconds, the interval between the dispatch of the carriers thus being 27 seconds, or about two and one-half times as great as that shown by results under actual service conditions. The results thus obtained were put in comparison with the time required for movement by autos of the corresponding mail arriving one week later.

The result was strikingly unfavorable to the tubes, the time required by the tubes being approximately twice that required by the auto. On Sundays a minimum number of postal clerks is on duty. The demand for rapid transmission of the mail is slight, there being no local deliveries and the requirements as to train connections being such as to permit leisurely handling. It is probable, therefore, that on the occasion of this so-called test the slow rate of speed of the carriers is to be accounted for by the lack of the necessary clerical assistants required to prepare the mail for handling by the carriers. But no statement on this point is made. The inference is therefore invited that the slow rate of movement and the consequent unfavorable showing was due to the incapacity of the tube, when, in fact, the entire volume of mail could have been moved in about one-third the time actually consumed had the postal clerks promptly prepared it for the carriers.

The conditions were likewise peculiarly favorable to the quick movement of autos, there being no street congestion whatever by reason of the fact that the test was made on Sunday. Thus, the movement of the tubes was retarded and the movement of the autos was expedited. The report contains no allusion to this disparity in conditions.

VI.—TWO OF THE MOST IMPORTANT AND USEFUL FUNCTIONS OF THE TUBE SERVICE WERE IGNORED BY THE REPORT.

The report of the committee of post-office officials says:

"The principal advantages of pneumatic tubes for the transportation of mail are:

"1. A high rate of speed between stations for limited quantities of mail.

"2. Freedom from surface-traffic congestion."

This is but a partial statement of the advantages and utilities of pneumatic-tube movement. It ignores and omits two of the most important and useful functions of the tube service, namely:

a. Dispatch of late mails, which would otherwise not catch specific trains.

b. Expedition of local mail interchange by reason of continuity of service and more speedy movement.

In all large city post offices mails in large volume pour into such offices in a practically continuous stream. It is sorted as fast as received, placed in pouches, and at a fixed minute is dispatched by auto to connect with specific outgoing trains. After the dispatch of the last auto destined for a specific train, mail which should go by that train continues to arrive. This late mail is forwarded by the tubes, at the rate of from 2,000 to 3,000 letters per minute, and the supplemental dispatch continues for approximately 10 minutes and in some cases a longer time.

This supplemental service could not under any conditions be performed by auto. It is made possible only by the existence of the tubes; and the service thus performed is of very great value to the business community, inasmuch as it advances the delivery of probably a hundred thousand letters every day by a period varying from a few hours to 24 hours or more. Without this supplemental service a great volume of important letter mail would fail to move by the most desirable trains, would therefore miss important connections in all sections of the country, and be greatly retarded in its movement.

The extent and value of the service rendered may be illustrated by the case of the Transcontinental Express, which leaves the Grand Central Terminal, New York, at 9.30 each evening. This train carries a very heavy mail for all important western points, particularly those beyond Chicago and on the Pacific coast. Mail carried by it makes close connections, and reaches its destination in the shortest possible time. Mail which misses this train is subject to a delay of from 12 to 24 hours, according to destination. This train also connects with the Pacific steamships, and if mail destined for Asia or Australia fails to connect with the Transcontinental Express a delay of from two to three weeks in delivery follows.

The last auto connecting with this train leaves the Hudson Terminal at 8.40 p. m. After departure of the last auto a supplemental dispatch by pneumatic tube continues for 10 minutes additional, the last carrier leaving at 8.50. A supplemental dispatch for this particular train is likewise made from all the branch post offices between the Hudson Terminal and the Grand Central Terminal. After the last auto has left with mail for the Transcontinental Express from 10,000 to 12,000 letters for western points are deposited in the various branch offices and forwarded by the tube.

This supplemental service is of the utmost importance, inasmuch as it avoids from 12 to 24 hours' delay in the delivery of from 10,000 to 12,000 letters, nearly all of which comprise banking and business correspondence, which it is highly important shall reach its destination at the earliest possible moment.

This illustration applies to every important mail train leaving the city of New York. The volume of supplemental letter mail thus expedited by the existence of the pneumatic tube equals or exceeds the entire daily mail of cities of the size of Chattanooga, Tenn.

The abolition of the pneumatic tube would deprive the several large cities of the great benefit of this supplemental movement, which function could not be performed by automobiles under any conditions.

Postmaster Morgan has testified that under conditions of snow and ice it is necessary to close the mails to be dispatched by autos about one-half hour earlier than usual. All the mail reaching the post office during this half hour, if dependent upon autos, would miss the next following train, and be delayed often many hours. It is all dispatched by the tubes, and is thus enabled to make the closest and most desirable train connection. The tubes, therefore, in the winter season prevent delay to a very large part of all letter mail and render a highly important service, which autos are incapable of rendering.

Had it not been for the facilities afforded by the tubes during the past winter a very large portion of the outgoing mails would have failed of their proper train connections and been subjected to delays in reaching their destinations ranging from several hours to a day or more.

Another function of prime importance performed by the tubes, and possible only by their use, is the expediting of local mail deliveries. More than 1,000,000 letters are deposited in the New York post office every day for local delivery. A very large proportion of these reach their destination within two to four hours' time. By reason of the speedy movement afforded by the pneumatic tube a letter may be dispatched to an address 12 or 15 miles distant and the sender may receive a reply the same day. The movement of the entire volume of local mail is greatly expedited in every city having a pneumatic tube. This expedition of local mail is an extraordinary and greatly appreciated public convenience, and to abolish the conditions which make it possible would certainly be the cause of great discontent and public indignation.

The part played by the pneumatic tube in local service may be illustrated by the movement of local mails between widely separated branch post offices in New York. A letter deposited in the most northerly postal station served by the tube in Manhattan addressed to the most southerly station will be immediately dispatched by the continuous service of the tube and received at the southerly station in 46 minutes, and within a few minutes thereafter will be delivered by carrier to the addressee. If sent by auto it would require 2 hours and 31 minutes' transmission time, and in addition might lie in the Harlem post office from 1 to 2 hours awaiting the dispatch of an auto. The intervals between the movements of autos plus the time required in transmission would aggregate approximately 4 hours or more, so that letters mailed at noon or later would reach their destination too late for delivery the same day.

In the case of letters mailed in Harlem and destined for Brooklyn the time required for auto delivery would be materially greater, so that very few letters in such case would reach their destination on the day of mailing. Thus in the case of New York a population of 5,600,000 people has its local mail, aggregating over 1,000,000 letters every day, expedited by the use of pneumatic tubes from 2 to 4 hours or more, whereby the handling of local letters has become exceedingly efficient.

The pneumatic tube is the utility which alone makes this possible.

No allusion to these highly important functions of the pneumatic tube is made by the report of the committee of postal employees.

VII.—THE BENEFITS OF PNEUMATIC TUBES ARE NOT RESTRICTED TO THE CITIES IN WHICH THEY ARE LOCATED, BUT ACCRUE TO THE ENTIRE COUNTRY.

By far the greater part of the entire volume of mails originates in, or is directed to, the great cities. The celerity of mail movement throughout the United States is in large degree dependent upon the celerity with which the mails are handled in those cities. The conditions of modern business are such that rapid movement of mails is of the first importance to the merchants and business men of every locality, however remote.

An immense volume of daily business transactions is dependent upon and regulated by the daily mail movement, and a delay in mails or their slow movement tends greatly to retard those transactions. So pressing is the need for speedy communication that the volume of telegraph transactions between country merchants and city centers has in recent years grown enormously and is constantly increasing. It is, therefore, necessary that business letters dispatched from all sections of the country shall reach their destination in the shortest possible time, and that the reply necessary to complete such transactions shall likewise be received at the earliest possible moment.

Slow handling of the mails in cities like New York, Chicago, and Boston, therefore, not only inconveniences but interferes with the necessary business operations of the entire circle of customers of those cities, and every one of those customers is benefited by the use of pneumatic tubes in the centers where mail congestion is greatest, and where slowness of mail movement entails ultimate delay of possibly many hours.

The abolition or curtailment of the tube service in any of the great cities therefore would materially decrease the expedition of correspondence between the country districts and the cities, and impose great inconvenience upon every section of the country.

The same reasons apply with added force to the mail movement between the great cities. The business transactions between these cities are of enormous extent and of a nature which require the utmost possible expedition. To abolish or curtail the tube service in any of the cities where it now exists not only affects the people of a particular city, but affects the business men of all the cities, by lengthening the time required for the interchange of correspondence. It is for that reason that the city of New York contends earnestly for the retention of the existing tubes in other cities, for their removal will not only inconvenience the people of Boston, St. Louis, Philadelphia, and Chicago, but will interfere with the prompt transactions of business between the merchants of New York and the merchants of those cities.

New York further objects to the specific recommendations made by the Postmaster General with reference to the tube service in this city. The entire system as it now exists is essential properly to meet the local needs of this community. The proposal of the Postmaster General makes possible, and even probable, the discontinuance of that part of the system north of Forty-second Street.

The section north of Forty-second Street not only contains a great number of the most important hotels, clubs, etc., but is also thickly interspersed with important business establishments, the number of which is increasing with great rapidity. The tubes in that section serve a population of more than 2,000,000 people and provide the sole means whereby local letters can promptly be interchanged with other sections of the city.

We strenuously object to any contingent provisions in the advertisement for contracts which shall permit the Postmaster General to discontinue the tube service in that section.

This phase of the questions was considered by the Pneumatic Tube Postal Commission appointed by Congress in 1912. Senator HOKE SMITH was chairman of that commission, which reported on October 24, 1914, as to the expediency of discontinuing any part of the existing system. The Smith commission said:

"In most of these cases, however, it is found that such sections are part of a general system of tubes, and that it would be inadvisable to eliminate these parts and thereby impair the usefulness of the whole system."

The proviso that the Postmaster General may cancel the contracts on six months' notice is highly objectionable. Such a provision in the contract would cripple the company subject thereto, as it would make it impossible for it to provide funds to make the necessary changes and extensions required for the efficiency of the service.

This association therefore contends that as to the city of New York the present system should be retained in its entirety under a single contract covering the period of 10 years without any provision for arbitrary cancellation.

VIII.—SUMMARY.

The soundness of the Postmaster General's recommendations rests wholly upon the soundness of so-called tests of the relative speed and utility of autos and tubes. His proposition is that autos equal tubes in efficiency and will move the mails with equal celerity at a lesser cost. He assumes that this is proved by the so-called speed tests.

To sustain that proposition would require that the regular movement of autos equal that developed by the tests. We have shown the character of these tests—that they afford no indication of the speed practicable under service conditions, and that any conclusions based thereon are therefore misleading. It has been shown that auto movement is subject to serious obstruction from traffic congestion, speed laws, snow and ice, and stops required at intermediate stations; and that for these reasons the actual service speed is very much less than that assumed, as the result of the so-called tests, to be practicable.

It has been shown that the so-called tests ignored all of these factors of obstruction, and that the results were presented as though they were typical and fairly representative of the conditions to be met.

Such is not the fact. It is proved by the experience of every important post office in the country that the actual service rate of speed of autos is not more than one-third that presented by the report of the committee of post-office employees and accepted by the Postmaster General. We have shown that the most important functions of the pneumatic tubes and their most important advantages were ignored or minimized by the committee. While the auto mail service in this city was disorganized and inefficient for many days in succession during last winter, the pneumatic-tube service continued without interruption, and by reason of its existence the entire volume of outgoing letter mails originating in this city was dispatched without delay. On those occasions the mail service would have been absolutely crippled had it not been for the existence of the tubes.

Every day the tube service accomplishes the prompt dispatch of probably 100,000 letters that, without such service, would be subjected to several hours, and on some occasions days of delay. The tubes expedite the delivery of local letters aggregating 1,000,000 daily by from 2 to 4 hours at certain periods of the day, and by 12 to 15 hours at other times. The service rendered by the tubes is of a kind wholly impossible to autos under any conditions. They serve a genuine and important public need. Their abolition or their restriction would greatly reduce the present celerity of mail service and would deprive the public of a most useful facility.

In its report Senator HOKE SMITH'S Pneumatic Tube Postal Commission said:

"The pneumatic-tube service for the transmission of mails in the cities in which such service is now installed is a valuable adjunct to the mail transportation service for handling first-class, registered, and special-delivery mails, not furnished by other means of transportation, and is justified by the advantages of availability, expedition, security, and reliability. Its considerable withdrawal or discontinuance would be regarded as an inadvisable curtailment of facilities."

For all these reasons this association contends that the tube service should be retained without reduction in each of the cities where it now exists, and that it should be extended as rapidly as possible to other important centers of mail traffic.

II.—FROM THE MAYOR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK TO THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, PROTESTING AGAINST ADDITIONAL MAIL TRUCKS IN THE CITY'S STREETS.

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
New York, December 29, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to direct your particular attention to the bill now before the House of Representatives which, if enacted, will deprive the city of New York of a large part of its pneumatic-tube service for the transmission of mails, requiring in place thereof the introduction of auto vehicles driven through the city streets. I wish to impress upon you the incalculable harm that must inevitably be worked by such a measure in making more acute and dangerous the traffic conditions, which already present a problem of alarming proportions.

The present tube system in this city covers all that part of the Borough of Manhattan lying south of One hundred and twenty-fifth Street; a connection between the Manhattan and Brooklyn general post offices; an extension from the Brooklyn general post office to the Long Island Railroad Station.

The bill (its legislative number I do not have at hand) had, I believe, as its sponsor the Postmaster General, and, having already been favorably reported out of committee, will shortly come before the House for consideration. It calls for the renewal of the tube service only as to that part of the system which is located south of Forty-second Street and for the line connecting the two general post offices, thus leaving unprovided for that portion north of Forty-second Street in the Borough of Manhattan, and the present extension from the Brooklyn general post office to the Long Island Railroad Station, at the corner of Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues in Brooklyn. It is contended by the advocates of the bill that the continuance of the complete tube service in its present form is not warranted by the cost, and the Postmaster General has indorsed that clause in the report of a committee of post-office employees which says:

"* * * We are recommending that a separate advertisement be issued for the service north of Grand Central and Times Square Stations, but that the contract be not renewed unless a very material reduction in cost is secured."

It is further proposed that if contracts are entered into they shall be for the term of 10 years, but subject to cancellation by the Postmaster General on 6 months' notice.

The many reasons against the proposed abridgement of the present system will be presented to Congress convincingly and in detail by the leading commercial organizations of the city. I shall not, therefore, rehearse the arguments dealing with the subject from a business standpoint which will be presented by others—arguments in favor of efficiency and labor-saving devices with which I am in hearty accord. But I do wish to dwell particularly upon one phase of the subject which seems to me to overshadow all others, vitally affecting, as it does, every inhabitant of this city, namely, the shortsightedness and folly of doing anything which must inevitably add to the great congestion of street traffic and the dangers resulting therefrom.

Impressed though the casual observer must be by the sight of automobile traffic through the chief thoroughfares of this city, only those who have given the subject some study have any idea of the size of the problem now confronting the city government. It is a problem of providing protection to human life which is daily endangered by the great current of vehicles passing through our streets.

The extent of this danger is forcibly illustrated by the fatalities and accidents which are of daily and hourly occurrence. Last year 659 people were killed and 23,000 injured in street accidents, 281 of those killed being children. Thus, one person was killed every 14 hours and one injured every 23 minutes of each day in the year. Of those killed, 105 met their death from motor trucks. Despite the fact that motor trucks number less than 2½ per cent of the total vehicles, they were chargeable with more than 16 per cent of the fatalities, a striking instance of the dangerous character of that class of vehicles, among which are included mail trucks.

This annual toll of human life in our city streets has excited public indignation and alarm. Constant and urgent appeals are made for measures of protection. Stringent traffic rules have been adopted and 650 policemen have been assigned exclusively to the regulation of traffic. Every possible effort is put forth to restrict the speed of vehicles in the street, and to secure such regularity of movement as shall permit an even and orderly flow of traffic. By reason, however, of the enormous number of vehicles and the great population which daily use our streets, the situation is hard to cope with, and is becoming increasingly difficult.

The resident population of the city of New York is now about 5,600,000. Careful estimates show that this is increased daily by a floating population of over 1,000,000, making the aggregate of over 6,500,000 people who use our streets daily. The number of vehicles in the city is:

Pleasure automobiles	116,065
Commercial automobiles	21,330
Dealers' automobiles	2,974
Total automobiles	140,369
Horse-drawn vehicles	73,727
Grand total	214,096

To this must be added many thousand vehicles, in large part automobiles, which daily enter the city from adjacent territory. The increase in the number of automobiles registered in this city in the year 1916 was 38,000. More than one-half of the population concentrates daily on the island of Manhattan, and passes along its streets. There is a corresponding concentration of vehicles, and the regulation of this enormous mass of traffic is difficult in the extreme.

So much for the general situation. Let me direct your special attention to conditions in those portions of the city where the present pneumatic-tube service is endangered by the pending bill, viz, (1) that covered by the portion of the tube system north of Forty-second Street in the Borough of Manhattan, and (2) the area of the Borough of Brooklyn, along the line of the extension from the general post office of that borough to the Long Island Railroad Station at Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues.

The north and south main arteries of vehicular traffic in Manhattan are at present taxed to capacity. Forty-second Street marks approximately the crest of the traffic wave. The congestion from Forty-second to Fifty-ninth Street is about the same as for the corresponding distance below Forty-second Street. From Fifty-ninth Street north in the Borough of Manhattan the main arteries for vehicular traffic are reduced by the obstruction of Central Park, which lies between Fifth and Eighth Avenues, and extends from Fifty-ninth Street to One hundred and tenth Street, a distance of 2½ miles. Even above Central Park, in the Borough of Manhattan, the congestion of traffic is great.

A traffic tabulation at Fifty-ninth Street, Broadway, and Columbus Circle showed that there are more vehicles passing this location than at any other point in the greater city. During the 10 hours from 8.30 a. m. to 6.30 p. m. 39,200 vehicles and 81,990 pedestrians passed this street intersection.

Following is a tabulation of some of the congested points in Manhattan from Fifty-ninth Street north:

Ten-hour period from 8.30 a. m. to 6.30 p. m.

Location.	Vehicles.	Pedestrians.
Fifty-ninth Street and Second Avenue	9,260	50,040
Eighty-sixth Street and Central Park West	8,310	12,742
Eighty-sixth Street and Broadway	13,042	23,710
Ninety-sixth Street and Broadway	10,083	29,849
One hundred and tenth Street and Eighth Avenue	11,664	12,113
One hundred and sixteenth Street and Fifth Avenue	6,625	22,568
One hundred and sixteenth Street, Seventh and Saint Nicholas Avenues	11,207	20,386
One hundred and twenty-fifth Street and First Avenue	10,343	10,427
One hundred and twenty-fifth Street and Third Avenue	10,348	23,659
One hundred and twenty-fifth Street and Seventh Avenue	10,565	40,119
One hundred and forty-fifth Street and Lenox Avenue	6,623	14,538
One hundred and eighty-first Street and Saint Nicholas Avenue	4,521	20,105
Manhattan Street and Broadway	8,534	28,942

Similar congestion of traffic exists in the business area of Brooklyn, lying between the general post office and the Long Island Station, upon the route proposed to be covered by mail vehicles. A traffic tabulation made at some of the street intersections in this vicinity showed the following results:

Ten-hour period from 8.30 a. m. to 6.30 p. m.

Location.	Vehicles.	Pedestrians
Court and Livingston Streets	5,418	18,125
Fulton, Adams and Willoughby Streets	6,018	35,504
Fulton Street, opposite Court Square	5,422	30,800
Fulton and Smith Streets	5,415	38,677
Fulton and Bond Streets	6,550	46,200
Fulton Street and Flatbush Avenue	8,017	30,700
Flatbush Avenue and Lafayette Street	6,264	26,500
Flatbush Avenue and Fourth	13,075	38,155
Atlantic and Fourth Avenues	7,906	18,940
Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues	6,073	19,315

The extent and density of the traffic as a whole is shown by the aggregate figures resulting from the tabulation referred to. It was found that of the 464 crossings where police officers are stationed to regulate traffic, an aggregate of about 3,407,069 vehicles and 15,545,745 pedestrians crossed at these intersections within 10 hours.

The auto trucks used for carrying United States mails, although but 243 in number at the present time, are the most difficult and obstructive factor in the entire problem. Having right of way over other vehicles, they constantly disrupt and interfere with the regularity of movement which is the essence of successful traffic regulation. They turn out to either side as occasion may permit, passing around and in front of other vehicles, thereby impeding or stopping the movement of the latter. They force other vehicles to pull up short and turn out of the way. They proceed against the current of traffic in one-way streets, and often, if not habitually, exceed the speed limit.

While nominally subject to the local laws, the knowledge that these mail trucks are in the service of the United States works an unconscious but none the less real influence upon the traffic officers, who are consequently reluctant to interfere with the apparent authority of the United States.

In short, it may be safely said that each mail truck on the streets of New York, in its aspect as an ever present menace to life, limb, and property, is equivalent to at least 10 ordinary commercial vehicles. The adding of one avoidable mail truck to traffic conditions in New York is the creation of an unwarrantable additional hazard to life and limb.

The people of this city are confronted by conditions of the utmost danger—conditions which are daily exacting a toll of human life and suffering. City officials are overburdened with the enormous and complex problem of the amelioration of these conditions. The proposal of the Postmaster General, as contained in this bill, is sure to aggravate the situation and add materially to the present danger.

On behalf of the City of New York, I protest against the enactment of a measure which adopts a policy of materialism and economy where the safety of men, women, and children is concerned—which, in spite of the forewarnings of those who must suffer the consequences, openly weighs the saving of dollars and cents against the greatly increased danger to human life.

I therefore urge upon you that the pneumatic-tube service as it now exists in this city be continued and that the bill now pending before Congress be amended to accomplish this result.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN PURROY MITCHEL, Mayor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has used 1 hour and 35 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] 30 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office bill, of course, is considered as one of the most important bills that comes before the House, and one in which every citizen in the land is interested. It is because of the interest of the American people in the activities of the Post Office Department that all of the Members of the House are to be found on the floor and in their seats when this bill is under consideration. [Laughter and applause.]

I am delighted to see the interest manifested by the Members of Congress in the preliminary stages of this important bill, carrying the enormous sum of $329,000,000. The constituency of the Members of Congress would be proud to see the interest that Members manifest in a bill which carries to every home messages of love, hope, and desires, and where every housewife can be found watching for the mail carrier to come in sunshine and storm bringing these messages from their loved ones throughout the world. [Applause.]

We have heard a good deal about the pneumatic-tube service. There is not a very great amount of money involved in the use of pneumatic tubes when you take into consideration the vast amount of money that this bill carries, for the total amount appropriated during all the period of the existence of the tube service has only involved $976,000 a year. The reason for the pneumatic tubes, if there is any reason whatever, is to do away with the congestion in the great commercial cities of the country, and the congestion in these great cities, I confess, does justify the consideration of the question of removal of the mail from the surface of the city streets.

To-day we have, all told, in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis 57½ miles of pneumatic tubes, ranging all the way from 6 to 10 inches in diameter, and these tubes are connected with the post office in each of these cities and with some of the outlying stations, as well as with some of the railroads. But the system of tubes that is in force is not complete; it does not move even the first-class mail to all points in the cities which I have named, and of all the mail moved I think it is fair to say that only 1½ per cent of the mail in these cities goes through the tubes. There can be no mail passed through the tubes except letter mail, and the average quantity of mail that passes through the tubes at any one movement is 5 pounds, though the receptacle in which the mail is moved would have a capacity of 15 pounds if it were packed compactly. We are paying $17,000 a mile for the use of the tubes, and in addition to the $17,000 a mile we pay for an additional handling of the mail that goes through the tubes, because all mail that passes through the tubes must be handled once more than the mail that is carried by automobile or wagon. The reason for that is that when the package of letters is put into the receptacle to go through the tubes it must be tied in a certain form; it must be compact. When it reaches its destination at the end of the tube it goes onto the worktable in the room where the tube terminates. This mail is then worked over by the distributers and distributed for dispatch upon the trains. In the city of Chicago, where I am most familiar with the situation, in addition to the $17,000 a mile which the Government pays for the use of the tubes we pay $60,000 or thereabouts for this additional handling of the mails that would not have to be paid if it were moved by any other means.

The people of all these great cities believe that the tubes are an absolute necessity. They insist that they ought not to be removed, and while my own investigation leads me to the conclusion that we could move the mail as quickly and for less money than we can through the tubes, I believe that my duty lies in doing what my people want done. If I am here in any capacity, I assume that I am here in a representative capacity, and the people of Chicago, in common with the people of all other cities, demand the continuation of the use of the tubes. They believe that if the tubes are eliminated it will be a step backward. I confess that one of the most important things in the great cities of the country is the removal from the surface of the streets of vehicular traffic which will eliminate the congestion and prevent accident. We have 207 automobiles on the surface of the streets of Chicago carrying the mail, and if those 207 automobiles could be removed from the congested streets of the city it would be a great relief. There is a way by which they could be removed, but it is not by the continuation of an 8-inch tube. The way to carry the mails in the great cities of the country is under ground. There can be no doubt about that. I am heartily in favor of removing from the street surface all of the automobiles that are now employed for transporting mail between the post offices and the railroad stations, but the way to do that would be to establish a system of tubes not less than 30 inches in diameter through which you could run a car on a track by compressed air, and on which car you could carry at least five or six bags of mail already distributed for transportation on the trains. Such a system as this could be inaugurated at an expense of not to exceed $10,000,000, and I firmly believe that it would be one of the best investments that could be made by the Government.

In the meantime, however, the tubes are especially useful for the transmission of special-delivery letters. In the city of New York there are about 2,000,000 special-delivery letters handled every year. In the city of Chicago, I think, 1,000,000 special-delivery letters are handled every year. These letters are delivered with great promptness, because of the opportunity of sending them through the tubes, but we must all remember that these tubes do not reach every section of the cities in which they are employed. They reach a very small section. For example, in the city of St. Louis there are only 2 miles of tubes. In the city of Chicago there are about 9 miles of tubes, while in Chicago we have 5,600 miles of streets and alleys, and have 1,121 mail trains arriving and departing every day. Yet while the tubes carry the mail at the rate of 30 miles an hour the delay which follows because of the redistribution of the mail which goes through the tubes reduces the speed with which these letters are carried through the tubes to a point where it is said by those who have made examinations and investigations the automobile will make better time. I have personally investigated the city of Chicago situation very thoroughly, and I must confess that in the first instance I was opposed to the placing of so many automobiles on Chicago streets, because the speed with which an automobile can run in the congested part of the city can not possibly exceed the movement of the traffic on those congested streets, whether it be by wagon drawn by horse or mule or in any other way. However, they are there and the postmaster of Chicago says that with 20 additional automobiles he can do the work which is done by the automobiles that are there now and the work which is done by the tubes, and that he can save the money now expended for redistribution and make a saving in the expenditure for the transmission of the mail of something like $146,000 to $175,000 a year, and give the people their mail with just as good dispatch as they receive it now.

On the other side of that question the business people of Chicago almost en masse have reached the conclusion that the postmaster of Chicago is wrong in what he says. They have reached the conclusion that to take away the use of the tubes would be a step backward, and they insist that the great city of Chicago, as well as the other American cities in which the tubes are in use, shall be given the privilege of continuing their use, and also of extending it if possible. As far as I am concerned, speaking in my representative capacity on behalf of the people of the great city from which I come, I shall plead with the House to continue the use of the present tubes until we can by some systematic plan reach a conclusion that will enable the Congress to decide to establish tubes large enough not only to take the first-class mail, which is about 1½ per cent of all the mail in weight, but to take all the mail off the streets. God speed the day when that time may come. I hope this Congress may authorize an investigation during its session which will result in a report that will mean the establishment of a tube service in every great city in America in the not far distant future, which will carry a car large enough to carry bags of mail five or six in number, and that in that way we will do away with the congestion and the possibility of injury and death by the use of the Government mail automobiles. In the meantime I beg of you gentlemen here to give some heed to the pleadings of the people who, whether right or wrong, believe that to take away these tubes would be to do a great injustice to them; and whether we be right or wrong—those of us who have made the investigation—I feel that the sentimental side of the question is worthy of some weight, and ought to be given due consideration, and because of my belief in the sentimental side of this question I shall do everything in my power to continue the use of these tubes until we can put in more efficient tubes.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GORDON. If I understood the purport of the gentleman's remarks, he has made a very careful investigation of this question and into the work and operation of these tubes?

Mr. MADDEN. I have.

Mr. GORDON. But he is now surrendering his individual judgment, formed as a result of that investigation, to what he considers the sentiment of the people on the street there in Chicago?

Mr. MADDEN. I absolutely said that; I do not deny that.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman think that is the proper way for a public official to vote the public money?

Mr. MADDEN. I think this: As a representative of the American people, I am here to speak for the sentiment that exists in the territory that elects me.

Mr. GORDON. Suppose they are wrong about it?

Mr. MADDEN. If they are wrong they pay the bills and they must abide by the results. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have the underground tube service now between the Capitol and the Library of Congress, which carries books back and forth. Would the gentleman do away with that service to oblige the gentleman from Ohio by substituting a surface system of horse cars or of electric cars to go back and forth from the Capitol to the Library?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I know very little about that system here, but I do not think it is of very great importance. If it is of service it ought to be kept.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does it not illustrate the importance of having tubes in congested centers for short distances?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the gentleman's investigating committee inquired in regard to what has been done in this respect in London, Paris, or Berlin?

Mr. MADDEN. There is not any tube service in London, Paris, or Berlin except tubes of 3 inches in diameter. They are building a tunnel in London now 9 feet in diameter through which they propose to run cars carrying mail when completed.

Now, as to the Rural Delivery System. The recommendation made by our committee for the rural-carrier service is $4,000,000 more than the recommendation of the department, and the reason for that is that the department said it could do away with 4,000 rural-delivery routes and save $4,000,000 by the introduction of automobiles over roads where automobiling is possible. The committee after careful consideration and consultation with the department heads has reached the conclusion that it might not be possible for them to save the $4,000,000 in any one year, even though they were given the power to do so, but the fair assumption would be that if they were able to inaugurate the system they outlined to the committee we could save $2,000,000 during the coming fiscal year, and it was because of the anxiety of the committee to extend the Rural Delivery Service to sections of the country not now having it—to people who were already clamoring for it—that the committee decided to recommend the appropriation of $4,000,000, which the department said it could get along without, because the committee believes that if during the reorganization work in the rural-delivery districts the department was able to save $2,000,000 out of the $4,000,000 during the coming year, that $2,000,000 ought to be expended on extensions in the Rural Delivery Service, and it is the understanding of the committee and the understanding of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General that whatever saving is made out of this $4,000,000 the committee added to the estimates is to be used in the extension of the Rural Delivery Service into territory where people are not now receiving it. So I believe that the committee was justified in giving the broadest powers of reorganization to the department in the Rural Delivery Service, for if no other object is to be attained than the extension of the service during the coming year to a million more of our citizens we think we have done something to bring them more in touch with the heart of the country than could be done in any other way.

Now, as to the second-class mail provision of the bill, I simply want to say that I have not been in accord with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads on this provision. I was not in accord because although I believe that some compensation should be paid by the publications of the country above what is being paid, I think that in view of the high cost of paper to-day, due to war conditions abroad and other conditions at home, nearly all publications are losing money, and that there is no reason why we should impose an additional burden upon them and thereby drive them out of business. I think the time is coming when they will be obliged to pay more than they are paying now, but I think we can reach some solution of the question to which everybody will agree.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In a moment. To-day the average distance of movement of these publications by rail is 900 miles. That would mean 3 cents to them where they pay 1 cent now. That would mean an additional heavy burden which they can not to-day meet with any success. More than that, I believe that the zone system would be injurious to the national thought of the country. I believe if we are going to have any system of additional payment it ought to be a flat payment, for I fear that if we fix the payment on the zone basis we will localize the territory into which these publications will circulate, and when we localize the circulation of a publication we localize the thought of the people and we sectionalize the country, and I believe we ought not to do anything that will sectionalize the thought of the people of America, but we, on the other hand, should do everything within our power to create a broader nationalism, if possible, than exists to-day. [Applause.] So I am opposed to the zone system for that reason if for no other. Some day in the not distant future I propose to see what I can do in cooperation with other men to work out a scheme by which justice will be done to all the interests involved, for I personally believe that these men who own these publications ought to pay more into the Treasury of the United States, and I believe they are coming to believe it themselves. Now, why not agree on some plan that will harmonize all the thought and maintain a policy of national thought among our people? [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman wish to say at this time as to what he would think of graduated increase in the cost?

Mr. MADDEN. I think perhaps that might be a good thing to do; but I do not think anything ought to be done now, for the facts show that on account of the enormously high price of paper nearly every magazine in the country is losing money to-day, and if you put the additional burden of this new tax upon them, many of them will go out of existence.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman what the surplus was last year in the Post Office Department?

Mr. MADDEN. It was $5,000,000 and something.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman object to going back a moment to the tube subject for just one question?

Mr. MADDEN. I will be delighted to do so.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not a fact that, while the gentleman's opinion disagrees with the Postmaster General's opinion, in the city of Chicago the Association of Commerce and other local organizations have made thorough investigations of the tube system and they are all very unanimous in favor of the retention of the tubes?

Mr. MADDEN. Everybody in Chicago is in favor of the retention of the tubes. I do not know how thorough their investigation has been.

Mr. BRITTEN. I merely want to call to the attention of the House that the matter of the retention of the tubes is simply a matter of difference of opinion.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes. Everybody there wants them, and I am for what they want.

Now, I think I might add two or three things in connection with other parts of this bill. This committee, I think, has wisely recommended a number of increases in the salaries of the lower grades of the employees in the departments. It has been necessary on account of the enormous increase of the prices of food, actual necessaries of life. Employers in the industrial and commercial world have granted their employees large increases in compensation, and there is no reason why the Government of the United States ought not to be as just, not to say generous, as any private employer in the land. All the great industrial institutions of America have been adding increases to the pay of the men who are employed by them. These increases have run all the way from 5 per cent to 25 per cent, and all of the great institutions that have been making money in the country lately on the blood of the men who are on the battle lines of Europe—and that is the only reason that they are making money, in my judgment—have been dividing their profits with their men. Now, the Post Office Department shows a surplus of $5,000,000 and more in its revenues for the current fiscal year, due to the prosperity of the country, due to the conditions which compel every industrial enterprise in America to feel that they must pay their men more money. We feel that the policy of the private employers of labor throughout the country ought to be a lesson to those who are in the management of the Post Office Department, and hence the committee has recommended an increase in the compensation of a good many of the men. That increase in compensation will be, of course, subject to a point of order, unless a rule is brought in.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask what increase is provided for the Postal Service?

Mr. MADDEN. An increase for clerks of from 5 to 10 per cent, as was provided for employees in the other departments. But this bill provides that all the postal clerks in first-class offices, where the classification act entitles them in first-class offices, run up from $800 to $1,100 automatically, and that where 75 per cent of the men drawing $1,100 are entitled to promotion to the $1,200 grade, all the men in the $1,100 grade shall go up automatically to the $1,200 grade. It provides also that 25 per cent of the men in the $1,200 grade shall go to $1,300. It provides also that 25 per cent of the men who are drawing $1,300 shall go up to the $1,400 grade. It provides that in second-class post offices all the men, instead of 75 per cent of the men, carriers and clerks, shall go from $1,000 to $1,100, and it provides that 25 per cent of the men in the $1,100 grade shall go to $1,200. The grade of $1,200 in second-class post offices was created in the classification act of 1907, but never since that day have any of the men in the second-class post offices of the country had any appropriation made by means of which they could take advantage of the provisions of the law, and this is the first bill that provides for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does that include rural carriers?

Mr. MADDEN. It does not include rural carriers, except on the 5 and 10 per cent increase.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SANITARY CONDITIONS IN POST OFFICES.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, considerable complaint has come from employees of the insanitary conditions that prevail in many post offices. It has been charged that the health of the postal employees has been needlessly sacrificed owing to indifference and neglect for the welfare of the men and women who handle the mail. It is a matter that should be investigated by the Public Health Service in order that some uniform system may be established in post offices to protect the health of the employees. It is estimated that 90 per cent of acute inhalation diseases and chronic catarrhal ailments are due to dust inhalations. It has been proven that dust and dirt are a direct incitant to serious diseases of the lungs. We are said to inhale about 1 pint of air every time we breathe and the expelled air is laden with poisonous substances. It is therefore a matter of grave concern how pure and fresh and how free from particles of dust is the air we breathe.

Tuberculosis causes death among post-office workers oftener than any other disease. When a clerk or carrier contracts tuberculosis he works on beside his fellow employees and endangers their health. He must work to provide for himself and his family, for when the time arrives when he can no longer perform the duties required of him and is forced to take a rest his pay ceases.

The character of the light that the employees work under is, too, a large factor in the upkeep of their health. Headaches, dizziness, defective vision, sleepiness, dullness, and forgetfulness, each and all of which impair the toilers' usefulness, are resultants of poor light. Not only is sunlight needed to prevent the several ills caused by artificial light, but it is needed more for the eradication of tuberculosis, which is a house disease that can not survive strong sunlight.

The efficiency of the Postal Service depends upon the health and strength and regular attendance to duty of its working force, which can not be maintained while sickness and the causes thereof are extant in the workrooms.

I trust that the Post Office Department officials will seek the cooperation of the United States Public Health Service in an endeavor to place the workrooms of post offices in proper sanitary condition, and that in the erection of new Federal buildings the hygienic welfare of the employees shall be considered.

COMPLAINTS OF EXCESSIVE OVERTIME.

Complaint is made of the excessive amount of overtime that is required of post-office clerks and letter carriers in post offices throughout the country. The cause for this complaint is the failure to increase the force of employees to meet the increase in business of the Postal Service. During the present wave of prosperity workers in all avenues of commercial and industrial activity have benefited by increased pay and a reduction in hours of labor. While the postal revenues have been mounting high, the burdens of the employees have been added to and advantage is taken of every technicality to utilize every minute of time and speed up the employees to the highest tension. It is charged that in certain post offices supervisory officials encourage employees to work in excess of eight hours and in violation of the eight-hour law not to record the time on the official daily reports. When all else fails the clerks and carriers are then required to work overtime, for which they are paid the regular hourly rate.

The eight-hour law was enacted to conserve the health of the employees in the Postal Service. Its purpose was to give an opportunity for rest and recuperation from the fatigue incident to the demand on the physical and mental energies of the employees. It was presumed to give an opportunity for self-development outside of working hours and to give the employees more time to attend to their personal and family affairs.

The policy of working the men overtime defeats the very purpose for which the eight-hour law was enacted and is a step backward. It is false economy, for the reason that waste of human energies with corresponding increase in sickness and breaking down of health of the employees can not be offset by the saving of a few dollars in a desire to economize.

In cases of emergency the postal employees are ready and willing to give the best that is in them and to work overtime if necessary in order that the mail will be collected, dispatched, and delivered promptly. The loyalty and faithfulness of the employees to the Postal Service have never been questioned, whatever the provocation or the emergency.

NEED OF A RETIREMENT LAW.

One of the most urgent needs of the Postal Service has been a retirement system for superannuated employees. It is remarkable that the Postal Service has been so well conducted in the absence of this much-needed reform. Many large business institutions have adopted a retirement principle with decidedly beneficial results. In fact, a retirement system is now recognized as essential to good administration.

The Post Office Committee has reported a bill favorably which, if enacted into law, will relieve the condition complained of. The bill provides for granting indefinite leaves of absence to postal employees who have become superannuated after years of efficient service. It is an administrative measure and possesses considerable merit, and I trust it will be enacted into law at this session of Congress. The bill holds a place on the calendar of the House, and I hope that it will be brought before the House for a vote in order to give the Members an opportunity to register their views on it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has used 1 hour and 22 minutes, leaving him 1 hour and 8 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be notified when I have used one hour.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to discuss the postal finances, and perhaps some of the other features of the bill. In order to do that, I want to read from the annual report of the Postmaster General:

> The expenditures for the fiscal year, as reported by the Auditor for the Post Office Department, were $306,204,033.14, an increase over the preceding year of $7,658,006.72, or 2.56 per cent.
> This exceptionally low rate of increase in expenditure is largely due to the efforts of postmasters. * * * Although the average increase in expenditures in the last three fiscal years was $16,673,525.44, due to enlarged postal facilities afforded the public, the rapid growth of the domestic parcel post and salary increases required by legislation, the service was successfully carried on and its cost defrayed from the current postal revenue.

Then I skip a few lines and read this:

> The fiscal year 1915, due to adverse conditions over which the department had no control, showed a deficit of $11,333,308.97; but the audited revenues for the year just closed show a surplus of $5,829,236.07. Although the audited revenues do not completely represent the financial results of the year, for the reason that many obligations of the Postal Service, representing railroad transportation, payments of contractors for the carrying of mail, and purchases made near the close of the year must be paid after the close of the year, the actual surplus, as nearly as can be determined by careful consideration of the outstanding obligations, is $5,216,243.61, of which amount the sum of $5,200,000 has already been turned into the Treasury. The total payments to the Treasury during the past four years is therefore $12,500,000.

Now, I want you to remember that figure. Then he goes on:

> That the Postal Service is now self-sustaining is evidenced by the fact that for three out of the four years of the present administration: Audited surpluses aggregating $14,716,350.03 have been shown. Deducting the audited deficiency in 1915 of $11,333,308.97, the net surplus for the four-year period is $3,383,041.06, and but for the business depression occasioned by the European war the department would have undoubtedly secured a surplus of not less than $18,000,000.

If it had not been for the European war, he says, which he intimates reduced the revenue in 1915, but he does not explain how it was with the war in 1916. The war had not stopped. It was worse than in 1915. The fact is he is trying to conceal the cause for the deficit of 1915.

I read further:

> This is in marked contrast with the deficits for the eight years of the two preceding administrations, which drained the Treasury of $48,739,639.31 and $24,927,657.40, respectively.

That is the Postmaster General's report on page 6—"a marked contrast" to the previous administrations, one of which had a $24,000,000 deficit and the other a deficit of $48,000,000.

Now, by "administrations" they must mean four years. I have always understood that an administration under our Constitution consisted of four years, but in the part of the report that I have just read you will notice that the Postmaster General refers to the four years of this administration that had already expired last spring, 1916, in June.

Now, why is that? I want to call your particular attention to this distinction, because unless we bear it in mind we get confused upon the result of these figures. An administration is four years, and we must bear in mind that a calendar year is one thing and a fiscal year another thing, and that the first six months of any calendar year belongs to the following fiscal year, Unless we bear this in mind we are easily confused.

Now, an administration does not begin until March 4. We find therefore that this administration, since the Democrats came in, have been claiming the credit for the fiscal year 1913. I have called attention to this error for three successive sessions, but I fail to have any effect upon the officials of the Post Office Department.

Now, a fiscal year, as I say, begins in one calendar year, but it takes its name from the following calendar year. Therefore the fiscal year 1913 began on the 1st day of July, 1912, when President Taft was in office, and the Republican administration continued for eight months and some days into March.

The Democratic Party took office in March, 1913, when there was only a little over three months left in that fiscal year. They passed no laws during that fiscal year. It is true, Congress was called into extra session in April, but it was not until October that they passed their tariff law—the Underwood Act. During the three months and the few days' balance of the fiscal year 1913 we were living and operating under Republican laws and policies, and nearly all of the officials of the department remained Republicans. Under the civil service they could not change them. There was not a change of policy. The parcel-post legislation had been enacted the year before and went into effect on the 1st of January, 1913, and therefore it was just in its incipiency. It began in January, and the administration went out in March.

Now, the fact is that unless we bear these things in mind we are liable to credit the Democratic Party for the surplus of the fiscal year 1913, for which they are entitled to no credit whatever. According to the statement of the Auditor of the Treasury, there was a surplus of $3,800,000 for the fiscal year 1913, but it having been accumulated during the Republican administration, under Republican laws, I think it is perfectly fair to wipe it out. The most that could possibly be demanded by the Democrats would be to claim one-third or one-fourth of that surplus. But I do not think they are fairly entitled to any of it.

We therefore have the fiscal year 1914, which began on the 1st day of July, 1913. When that fiscal year began the European war had not begun. The war did not begin until more than a year later. The European war did not begin until a month or six weeks after the close of the fiscal year 1914, because that war began in August, 1914. The fact is that notwithstanding the inauguration of the parcel post, which was then bringing in revenue at the rate of nearly $4,000,000 a month, the revenues were not increasing, as compared with former years.

The Democrats sought to explain by blaming it on the European war, and I discussed that feature at the time. They went so far as to say that the European war affected the postal revenues before it happened. Well, if that were true, there was a mightier leak of information in those days, even more than in these days. [Laughter.] We have heard a great deal of complaint because certain speculators on the stock exchange received advance information about the prospects of war or peace lately. But just think of the money that a man could have made in 1914 if the Postmaster General is correct when he says that the effect of the European war was felt a month or six weeks before it happened. [Laughter.] Of course, if the war had been known of beforehand the case would have been different. The Postmaster General spoke of "the rumblings," as he called them, and all his assistants have repeated that expression—that there were "rumblings of the war" before it came. You know the stock exchange was closed and prices went to smash when the war did actually come. If anybody had known of the coming of the war beforehand, this present leak, compared with that, would not have amounted to a drop of water in comparison with the ocean.

But let us lay aside the fiscal year 1913, and let us see how the financial operations of the Post Office Department stand for the last three fiscal years, which were wholly in Democratic administration. But before I point out the figures I want to say this: The Post Office Department is doing business upon a different plan from ordinary business concerns. This must also be borne in mind: The Post Office Department sells for cash. Everything that it sells it sells for cash. It is not difficult, therefore, to find out the amount of business they do, so far as the receipts are concerned, because before you use the mail you have got to put your money into their hands. Not so with regard to what they buy. The Post Office Department buys the services of clerks, of inspectors, of supervisors, and other officials. It buys the services of railroad companies, of contractors for screen-wagon service and stage lines, for star routes, and for rural routes. But it never pays anybody in advance. It pays when it pleases, usually most of it within the year in which the services are rendered, but not necessarily.

Now, unless we bear this in mind we are liable to come to the same conclusion that the Chairman evidently has when he says that when you take the receipts and expenditures and compare them it is a certain indication of whether or not the Postal Service is run at a profit. But it is not so. I want you to bear in mind another thing: Whenever you see a postal bill you will notice the first lines read in this way:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department, in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, as follows.

That is a long way to go back. That act of 1836, which few people take the trouble to look up, is the act that devotes the postal revenues to the Postal Service, and it provides that they shall be paid out only upon appropriations by Congress.

There is another clause in every Post Office appropriation bill which, no doubt, is familiar to many. I hold in my hand the Post Office appropriation act for 1913, and the same provision is contained in every one; also in conformity with the original act:

SEC. 12. That if the revenues of the Post Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenue of said department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenues for the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1913, and the sum needed may be advanced to the Post Office Department upon requisition of the Postmaster General.

Now, mind the distinction. These other appropriations are out of the revenues. This deficiency is out of the Treasury. You can not extend it beyond the year in which the deficiency occurs. That requisition, under another provision of the law, is entered upon the receipts. Every dollar taken from the Treasury must be receipted for. So that you have the certificate of the Postmaster General as to the deficiency and you have the payment for the deficiency. We must, therefore, bear in mind that money can not legally be drawn from the Treasury except for a deficiency in postal revenues. That is when the postal revenues are not sufficient to pay the expenses. In other words, the Treasury Department is the proprietor of the business. The Post Office Department is the agent that carries on the business. If the agent earns more than he receives, that surplus goes to the proprietor. If the receipts are less than the expenditure, the Postmaster General certifies that there is such a deficit, and the Post Office Department gets the money from the Treasury. Your Uncle Sam stands back and pays the bills.

Now, probably I would not have entered into this discussion if it had not been for the invidious allusion in the Postmaster General's report, in which he says—

In marked contrast with the deficits of the former administration.

The first administration of President Wilson will embrace the fiscal year 1917. It continues legally until the 4th of March, but the fiscal year which will be credited to him will be the fiscal year 1917 and the three prior years. Now, only three of these years have expired. The Post Office Department evidently has a press agent, for when the annual report of the department was made public and advance copies were sent out nearly every newspaper in the country had a similar statement of the financial operations of the department. I take this from the Minneapolis Journal:

BURLESON REPORTS $5,200,000 SURPLUS—ANNUAL POST-OFFICE STATEMENT ASKS FEDERAL WIRE SERVICE AND AERIAL EXPERIMENTS.

WASHINGTON, December 9.

Postmaster General Albert S. Burleson's annual report, issued to-day, declares there was a Post Office Department surplus of $5,200,000 during the present year, and enumerates as among the year's accomplishments improvement of the parcel post, extension of city and rural deliveries, and development of the Postal Savings System.

A surplus of $12,500,000 is shown, says the report, for three years of the four the administration has been in office, and it calls attention to deficits under previous administrations.

The department, in recommendations for improvement of the service, urges that early action be taken by Congress declaring Government monopoly over all utilities for the public transmission of intelligence, and that as soon as possible the telephone and telegraph facilities of the United States be incorporated into the Postal Establishment; that $300,000 be appropriated now for acquiring telegraph and telephone utilities in Alaska, Porto Rico, and Hawaii; that the pay of rural carriers be equalized by fixing salaries on the basis of the number of pieces and weight of mail transported, length of routes and time required to serve them, instead of solely on length of routes as at present; that $100,000 be appropriated for experiments in aerial transportation of mail.

This says "of the four years the administration has been in office." I call attention to the fact that they had only been in office three years. I hold in my hand a letter from the Treasury Department, signed by Mr. Malburn, one of the Assistant Secretaries, which gives the figures. I also hold in my hand here the Postmaster General's report, which gives the figures I have stated. I also have the auditor's report here before me. The auditor is the official of the Treasury Department who audits the accounts of the Post Office Department. Before I read these figures I want to recall to you the statement I made a while ago, that the Post Office Department sells for cash and buys on time, and that whether or not it pays quickly or slowly seems to be within its own discretion. The Postmaster General refers to this, for in his report he says for that reason you can not always estimate the actual surplus. They usually postpone the payment of from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 every year. It varies in the different years that I have examined. Railroad transportation bills, star-route bills, and other bills are not paid during the fiscal year, although those bills are for services rendered in that year. This being true, it is evident to everybody, and ought to be evident to the chairman of this committee, that when the Auditor for the Post Office Department certifies to the amount of the audited revenues and the audited expenditures for any one year that does not mean that it indicates whether the department did business at a profit or not. It depends on how many unpaid bills remain. Otherwise you could postpone so many bills that you would have an enormous difference between the audited receipts and the audited expenditures. It is just as if a man was getting $20 a week and he was paying $10 a week for his board, $6 a week for his room, and spending $4 for incidentals. Under that plan he would come out even if he had $20 a week; but under the system that governs the finances of the Post Office Department, in order to show a surplus earning for any one week, all he would have to do would be to say, "Here, I will not pay my board bill, $10, until next week." Then he would make a financial statement showing that he had paid out only $10 and had earned and received $20, leaving a surplus of $10.

Now, if the Post Office Department receives $300,000,000 in cash and postpones the payment of its transportation bills or other bills beyond the fiscal year to the amount of $10,000,000, of course, even though the receipts are exactly the same as the expenditures, it will show under this system an audited surplus of $10,000,000.

I have here a comparison of the postal revenues and expenditures, taken from these official figures, which I shall insert in the RECORD. You can examine them for yourselves. Speaking only in round figures, for the fiscal year 1913 the revenues were $266,000,000 and the expenditures were $262,000,000. The next year, 1914, they received $287,000,000 and paid out $283,000,000. In 1915 they received $287,000,000 and paid out $298,000,000. Last year they received $312,000,000 and paid out $306,000,000. Now, if we eliminate the year 1913, we have the result that instead of being a surplus there is a deficit.

Comparison of postal revenues and expenditures, 1913 to 1916, inclusive.

Fiscal year—	Revenues.	Expenditures.
1913	$266,619,525.65	$262,067,541.33
1914	287,934,565.67	283,543,769.16
1915	287,248,165.27	298,546,026.42
1916	312,057,688.83	306,204,033.14

From the tables I have read it will be noted that the business for the year 1914 showed that the receipts amounted to $287,000,000 and the disbursements to $283,000,000. For 1915 the receipts were $287,000,000 and the expenditures $298,000,000, showing expenditures of $15,000,000 more than the year before. While the receipts for 1915 were $686,000 less than for the year before, the difference in the expenditures was more than 5 per cent. How the department could, during 1914, accumulate a surplus of $3,500,000, and make a deficit of $11,000,000 in the next year upon substantially the same amount of business, is difficult to understand.

But here is a remarkable thing. The Auditor for the Post Office Department issues every quarter a statement of receipts. I hold in my hand the financial statement of the Auditor of the Post Office Department for the quarter ending June 30, 1915. That is the last quarter. It says that the postal revenues for 1915 were $287,248,165, and the postal expenditures were $298,546,036; that the adjusted losses and contingencies were $35,447. The excess of expenditures over the revenues was $11,333,308.

Now, for 1914, the postal revenues were $287,934,565. The expenditures were $283,543,769, and the excess of revenues over expenditures was $4,376,463.

At the bottom he shows the excess of increase or decrease. Now look at the increase. The postal expenditures increase of 1915 over 1914 was $15,002,257. Can anybody explain to me why the Post Office Department expended $15,000,000 more in 1915 than it did in 1914, when they did $600,000 less business? Here is the most remarkable record of any business institution in the world. They spent $15,000,000 more to do $600,000 less business!

Now, you will recall, if you listened to what I had to say two or three years ago, that I commented on the statement of the Postmaster General in 1913 to the effect that the previous administration had not given a fair statement of their finances and the surplus because they had postponed the payment of bills beyond the fiscal year, and therefore created a surplus for 1911.

They claimed that Mr. Hitchcock, the Postmaster General, had unduly delayed paying debts of the department in order that the receipts should exceed the expenditures during that year. Of course, in every year they pay some bills that were included in the previous year. Postmaster General Burleson claimed in 1913 that this was a bad practice on the part of his predecessor.

Now, that gives the key, perhaps, to this whole thing. Why was it that it cost $15,000,000 more to do $600,000 less business? I can not understand it; it is too deep for me; but possibly they hurried up the payment of bills. It seems discretionary with the department as to when they pay their bills; they can run it over into another fiscal year. If the Postmaster General wants to show an audited surplus for any one year, he can easily refuse to pay the bills. You can not sue him, he can hold the railroad companies up for three months or one month, and then show a surplus of twenty or thirty million dollars, or anything to suit himself. Of course, the following year would be a bad year, because these things come due at some time and can not be delayed much longer.

The Post Office Department has, to some extent, practiced this method of increasing its surplus. I will tell you why and how. They claim that they received a revenue for 1915 or 1914 of fifty or sixty million dollars for parcel post, when something like a million pieces were carried as early as 1914. Of course, that increased the burden of the rural carriers, and in recognition of the fact that we had increased the load and amount of work the carriers had to perform, Congress in its wisdom, by the resolution which took the place of the appropriation act of 1914, fixed a flat salary on a standard route of the rural carrier of 24 miles at $1,200 per annum.

The department would not pay it. They resorted to a remarkable construction, in which, strictly speaking, legally and technically they were justified—that the law said they should be paid "not exceeding" so much. But the fact is that every officer in the department had his salary fixed at "not exceeding," and the railroad companies fixed at "not exceeding" so much. Every expenditure that was made, almost without exception, was under the law that said "not exceeding." But the Post Office Department, as against the rural carriers, refused to pay them their full salary and withheld a part of it. I was informed that some of these claims, 3,000 of them, had been examined by an attorney recently, and he found that they averaged about $70 each. There were 43,000 rural carriers, and if you multiply 70 by 43,000 you get $3,000,000, and not a cent of that has been paid until very lately. They refused entirely to pay it until the last Post Office appropriation act contained a mandatory direction saying that the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the rural carriers salaries withheld from them in the year 1915. The Democratic Congress, in both Houses, recognized the justice of it and directed the administrative officers to pay the debt, and they are now slowly proceeding to do so. I am advised by the Assistant Postmaster General that only a few have been adjusted. I have not the least hope that they will all ever be adjusted before another fiscal year, so that they will escape the result of the audit in the financial showing of this year.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. What excuse does the Post Office Department give for not having adjusted all the claims; they have been out for six months under the last appropriation bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is no excuse. Here is their letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
DIVISION OF RURAL MAILS,
Washington, January 4, 1917.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: Referring to your inquiry by telephone to-day with reference to the payment to rural carriers of additional sums due them under the provisions of the act approved July 28, 1916, being the difference between what they received for their services during the fiscal year 1915 and what they would have received had the present law regulating the salaries of rural carriers been in effect, I beg to advise you that these accounts are being adjusted as rapidly as possible, and at the close of this week approximately 75 per cent of the accounts will have been stated for payment. It is expected that, so far as the work of this office is concerned, all accounts will be adjusted by the middle of February.

It is not possible to state at this time the actual sum which has so far been paid to the carriers under the provisions of the act cited, as this computation has not been made. As soon as possible definite information on this point will be furnished you.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Now, there is another thing which illustrates the way in which the Post Office Department has created an artificial surplus. You know that the parcel-post law was passed in 1912 and took effect in 1913. It contained an authority to the Postmaster General to change the limit of weight. The act itself raised the weight limit from 4 to 11 pounds, which was the universal limit of weight according to the universal postal congress. But Congress gave to the Postmaster General authority and power to raise the weight of the packages and classification. He proceeded to do so in the summer and fall of 1913, when he raised it from 11 pounds to 20 pounds, and from 20 pounds to 50 pounds in the zones.

The system under which we were paying the railroads was under the quadrennial weighing, the country being divided into four sections, and after you weighed one section to determine the number of pounds carried, that weight governed for four years in the future. The section of it that had been weighed just before this would be bound by that weight for four years, and they never would get a cent unless Congress came to their relief. They pleaded with Congress for relief. In the act approved March 4, 1913, it is provided that on account of the increase in the weight of the mails resulting from the enactment of section 8, increasing weight limit from 4 to 11 pounds we should pay the railroads an extra amount for the increased weight limit. Last year's Post Office appropriation act also contained a provision as follows:

SEC. 3. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order numbered 7720, of December 18, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages, effective from January 1, 1914, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after January 1, 1914, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 1 per cent thereof per annum.

SEC. 4. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order numbered 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon the limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

The railroads have not yet been paid these items. Mind you, that covers three years. It covers 1914, 1915, and 1916. We allow them 1 per cent upon the total amount of compensation for transportation of mail by weight for each year for the annual increase in weight limit, and for the other increase in weight limit we give them one-half of 1 per cent for each year. The appropriation for railroad transportation was about $50,000,000 per year. One per cent would be $500,000, but for three years it amounts to a million and a half. That has not been paid. For the other it amounts to one-half of that. So you see that the total appropriation by Congress on account of the change in the weight limit of parcels carried by mail would amount to between two and three million dollars. Not wanting to exaggerate in any way, I wrote to the Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Praeger, and I have his letter here:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
DIVISION OF RAILWAY ADJUSTMENTS,
Washington, January 4, 1917.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: In response to the telephonic inquiry of your secretary to-day, relative to the amounts allowed the railroad companies under the provisions of sections 3 and 4 of the Post Office appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917, you are informed that the estimate submitted at the time this legislation was proposed was for a total of $1,407,000. The orders on all routes entitled to this allowance have not yet been issued. Those issued to date carry allowances aggregating $1,098,329.25. The remaining orders are being issued as rapidly as practicable.

Yours, very truly,
OTTO PRAEGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster General.

I asked him how much the unpaid railroad charges were that Congress had ordered paid and which they are now proceeding to adjust, which they have not paid and which do not appear in any statement. He estimated $1,407,000 was the amount. There is not a dollar of it in any of the departmental reports that have been made. If we, therefore, take $3,000,000 off for the rural carriers' salaries and $1,400,000 for the railroad-transportation pay and charge it up to these same three years of Democratic administration, we will find that it affects the result quite materially. The result of the postal operations for the last three fiscal years is as follows: Estimated surplus, 1914, $3,500,000; audited deficit, 1915, $11,333,308; estimated surplus, 1916, $5,200,000. Add those two surpluses together and it makes $8,700,00 that is to be credited to these three years, but you must charge them with $11,300,000 and with the $3,000,000 rural carriers' pay, which they have not paid yet, and railroad pay on accuracy of increased weight limit of parcels estimated at $1,400,000, making a debit of $15,733,308 and a net deficit for the three years of $7,033,308. This is the glorious record which has been published throughout the land—that under this administration these three years they have deposited in the Treasury $12,500,000 to the enrichment of Uncle Sam. As a matter of fact, their own figures show that they have not any surplus, and that if they pay their bills, which are long past due, which I have mentioned, the net deficit is $7,033,308.

There is a remark in the report of the Postmaster General which I have characterized as partisan, wherein he says that this is in marked contrast with his predecessors.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does it seem possible to the gentleman that the chairman of the committee was informed of these interesting figures when he made the observations he did at the beginning of his address to-day?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I do not think that he was. I think most people universally, including myself, were surprised when they found out these facts; and I will tell you right now that I believe the officials in the Treasury and in the Post Office Department are very much interested, judging from the number of telephone calls I have had from both of those institutions in the last few days.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It strikes me that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] owes the gentleman an apology.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems so to me, too, although his language, considering the source whence it came, possibly was parliamentary enough.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the Postmaster General has any legal right to withhold the amount of money that the gentleman says is withheld from the rural carriers' salary at this time?

Mr. STEENERSON. None whatever. How are these surpluses obtained? I have figured out here. I have a statement showing the draft of each year for deficits, and I will show you deposits on account of the surplus. But one remarkable thing relates to the dates. This statement which I have shows that on March 24, 1915, the Post Office Department withdrew $1,000,000 as a grant from the Treasury for a deficit. They had to say that it was a deficit.

On March 26 they certified another deficit of $1,000,000, and on March 30 another deficit of $1,000,000, making $3,000,000 which they withdrew from the Treasury in the last week in March, 1915. That same week they deposited $4,500,000 on account of surplus for the previous year of 1915. [Laughter.] They did not seem to have the money—I do not say that is true, but it looks that way—until they went into the Treasury and certified that there was a deficit. Then they got the money. They withdrew it within a week. If a man wants to deposit a surplus earned in a business, why does he not take it out of his pocket and put it in, and not borrow it? On the Treasury statement they have a deficit of $3,000,000, and then they deposit $4,500,000. You can figure it out. I will insert the table here:

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman want us to understand that they borrow money in order to make a surplus?

Mr. STEENERSON. I did not say that. I say they go to the Treasury and withdraw money just about the same time and in the same week that they deposit a surplus on account of the previous year. I do not know whether it is the same money or not. They might have had the money in some other pocket for all I know. [Laughter.] But you can not get around that the statement was made. I regret to say very much I have not got the exact date that these were made, as I lost my papers. But the substance of it is, it shows that they waited for the first deposit of a surplus one year after the fiscal year had expired. The $3,800,000 they deposited on account of the surplus of 1913 was not deposited until the last day of June the following year.

Why should they wait a whole year after the year had expired before they deposited the surplus is more than I can understand. In the meantime they had made several drafts. The next year, 1915—that is the disastrous year—they waited nine months—that is the one of which I have just spoken of, in March—nearly nine months before they paid the surplus. They said they earned a surplus of $4,500,000 in 1914, and they did not pay it until March, and a day or two before that, or at the same time they withdrew this $3,000,000. But 1916 is different. In 1916 they deposited $5,200,000 surplus promptly, considering their usual method of business. They deposited it within eight weeks of the end of the fiscal year. I think it was in August, 1916, and the public knew about it promptly.

The press agent for the department furnished it to every newspaper in the United States—and I got inquiries from my district about it—that they had a surplus of $5,200,000 for 1916. And they paid it. They did not wait a year, as they did the first time. Why this difference in time of payment of surpluses that are earned is beyond my comprehension. However, if we foot up, as I will in the record, the total amount drawn out of the Treasury and the total amount paid into the Treasury during the last three years you find that the difference is exactly $363,407.40.

	363,407.40

Very truly, yours,

WM. P. MALBURN,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. KEARNS. Deficit?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; $300,000 more put in than the total taken out. But as I have stated they did not claim that as a surplus, but they did claim that they put into the Treasury profits, surpluses of twelve and a half million dollars in the last four years, while their own statement shows they have drawn within $300,000 of what they paid in. I will here insert the letter of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Malburn. Of course if we deduct the deficit of 1915 of $11,300,000 and the amount they owe, which is $4,400,000, we will still have something like $3,000,000 that they are actually behind when they have paid their bills. These are the remarkable figures of the Democratic postal business, that, although they drew out within $300,000 of the amount they put in they claim that they have enriched the Treasury twelve and a half million dollars. Now, that beats the story of the loaves and fishes, it seems to me.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does it occur to the gentleman these figures will be somewhat in the nature of a revelation to Mr. Burleson; I refer to the figures the gentleman is giving now?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think it is a revelation to Mr. Burleson, because he foreshadowed it in his report that it is not the best method of finding out the surplus by deducting or adding the difference between receipts and expenditures.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman really does not mean to intimate that Mr. Burleson is conscious that there is a deficit instead of a surplus?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I suspect it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is really shocking.

Mr. STEENERSON. I know it is shocking, in view of the fact that since the office of the Postmaster General was created the statute as drawn and the form of oath he subscribed to which among other things he swears that he will make correct accounting, but it does not seem to me this can be correct.

What we need is a change of law, so that no Postmaster General can deposit funds to be accepted as a surplus unless it is a surplus. It seems to be in the power of the Postmaster General, as the law is now construed—I presume they think they have a right to construe it that way—to make a deposit as of two years ago, and say, "I deposit this as a surplus, because since then we have found out there should have been a surplus of three and a half million, and therefore I will deposit the money I now have," which, of course, is out of the earnings of the current year. I do not think that ought to be permitted. It seems to me there ought to be some way whereby the accounts of the Auditor of the Treasury to the Postmaster General should show the actual facts. They say they can not do it now because they do not pay the bills in the year in which they occur.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to notify the gentleman from Minnesota that he has consumed an hour, as the gentleman desired to be notified.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. May not this marvelous and mysterious system of which the gentleman speaks be accounted for or defended as one of the triumphs of new bookkeeping of which we have heard so much.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. I believe there ought to be some new bookkeeping. I believe the Federal Trade Commission, which is now undertaking to advise all the business men of the United States how to establish a cost-accounting system, ought to help out the Post Office Department, so that they could determine whether they make or lose money every year. I think it can be done, but it is not being done now.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman recalls in the Treasury Department last September there was a change of bookkeeping.

Mr. STEENERSON. There was a change in the bookkeeping in the Treasury.

Mr. FESS. By which $80,000,000 was added without adding a dollar.

Mr. STEENERSON. And if you look at the Treasury statement of yesterday you will find they had a balance in the general fund of about $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 more than they have got.

Mr. FESS. What is the new balance to show?

Mr. STEENERSON. And that statement shows the United States debt has been increased instead of having a surplus.

Mr. FESS. Are we to expect some new method to show how this deficit has become a surplus?

Mr. STEENERSON. What the Treasury Department ought to have done would have been to adhere to the former method, so that the people could compare the different years; but by altering the basis of comparison they go wild; they can deceive the public, and they do deceive them, unintentionally, I presume. You see, the newspapers publish the amount of deficit and the amount of general balance——

Mr. MOON. What was the deficit in the Post Office Department under four years of the Roosevelt administration?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think you have stated it correctly in the Postmaster General's report.

Mr. MOON. What was it. I did not state it. What was the deficit in the Taft administration?

Mr. STEENERSON. It was $24,000,000 and $48,000,000 in the other. But the gentleman must remember that that period was the time of the growth of the rural free delivery. If the people think now that the rural delivery is a loss, they are mistaken; but it takes years before there are proper fruits from a new line of business. When, under Roosevelt and Taft and other Republican administrations, we established a Rural Free Delivery Service, it caused a deficit. The increased deficit was due largely to the establishment of a rural delivery, and I believe to-day, when all accounts are squared, the rural free delivery will be found to be on a paying basis.

Mr. SLOAN. Was there any attempt to conceal any deficit in the Taft or Roosevelt administration?

Mr. MOON. Is there any attempt to conceal the facts in existence to-day?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; except inferentially. Will the gentleman yield five minutes more?

Mr. MOON. How long have you been talking?

Mr. STEENERSON. One hour.

Mr. MOON. That is just a short time for you. I will be glad to give you five minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Thank you.

I want to say a few words about the second-class mail. I think there are some elements that are overlooked. In the first place, the men who claim that the same rate should be paid upon all mail matter, or approximately so, are mistaken. The mail service is a transportation business, and all transportation business must be carried on under a scientific classification of rates. You must have high-class freight and you must have low-class freight. Very often one class of freight must be carried at a loss. If you are serving a manufacturing district and coal is the primal element of their success, railroad transportation companies often carry coal at a loss, because it stimulates the transportation of other freight, such as silk, cotton cloth of all kinds, and tea, and coffee, and first-class passenger travel. It stimulates those things, and therefore they are willing to carry coal at less than it costs, and many times less per ton than they charge for first-class freight. That is the scientific principle of rate making, which we must not overlook when we apply it to the Postal Service.

Another thing is, the Post Office Department has for many years, under authority of Congress, operated the blue-tag system, whereby they transport for long distances a large part of this second-class mail as freight, and therefore it is not correct to say it costs 8 cents a pound to carry the second-class mail. No mail to-day costs that much. Those figures were made by Mr. Hitchcock when the railroad transportation rates were higher. We have reduced them. We have applied the blue-tag system and in other ways we have economized. And, if I am correctly informed, the space plan reduces very materially the cost of transportation by rail to the Government.

I insert extracts from the the space-plan act—act of July 28, 1916. It will be noticed that the Post Office Department can transport periodicals by freight or at express rates when they desire. They can employ the cheapest transportation for periodicals:

The provisions of this section respecting the rates of compensation shall not apply to mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains, for which rates not exceeding the usual and just freight rates may be paid, in accordance with the classifications and tariffs approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall submit, under oath, when and in such form as may be required by the Postmaster General, evidence as to the performance of service.

The Postmaster General shall, from time to time, request information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, and may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission for the determination of a postal carload or less-than-carload rate for transportation of mail matter of the fourth class and periodicals, and may provide for and authorize such transportation, when practicable, at such rates, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to provide and perform such service at such rates and on the conditions prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, distinguish between the several classes of mail matter and provide for less frequent dispatches of mail matter of the third and fourth classes and periodicals when lower rates for transportation or other economies may be secured thereby without material detriment to the service.

Another thing that was mentioned by one of the gentlemen, and which the chairman of the committee said was an old argument, but which does not destroy its force, is that by the advertising that is circulated in these periodicals first-class mail is stimulated. There is no doubt but millions and millions of first-class mail is produced by these advertisements. Now, if a business man can spend, as he often does, 20 per cent, 30 per cent, 40 per cent of his receipts to advertise, to stimulate his business, it seems to me it would be within the legitimate bounds of good business to give a rate below cost in order to stimulate a publication business that indirectly produces first-class mail. These arguments have often been made, and they are as good now as they ever were. Therefore, I say we should not overlook that, in addition to the things that have been mentioned here, and for that reason I do not believe that we ought to adopt the very radical rates in this bill. But I am willing, with the chairman, to agree to a reasonable increase, one step at a time. He suggested a cent and a half flat rate. I would be willing to do that, and perhaps more.

Mr. MOON. Let me ask the gentleman if it is his suggestion that it should be a cent and a half flate rate beyond the first zone of 300 miles?

Mr. STEENERSON. I never thought about it at all until I heard the gentleman from Tennessee suggest it in his remarks; and I will say this, that I have had calls from two or three publishers, who told me—one of them, from St. Paul, recently—that he was tired of being accused of absorbing a subsidy from the Government and he was willing to pay twice what he is paying now. He is willing to pay 2 cents a pound, and he is publishing a paper that circulates throughout the country. And I believe the publishers are, many of them, in the same position, that they would prefer to pay a reasonable increase rather than to be accused of getting a subsidy. But the proposed rate is, I believe, beyond what it actually costs the Government.

I do not believe to-day that it can be possible that it costs the Government so much a pound as the gentleman has stated. For this reason: The average haul of newspapers and magazines—that is, take the same class altogether—does not exceed the average haul of parcel post, and they only charge about 6 cents a pound for parcels, and yet they say they are making now $70,000,000 a year on that. And if they do, then they include in that the cost of handling, which is 2 cents. Then it seems to me that 2 or 3 cents would cover the whole amount for the cost of transportation of second-class mail matter. And, therefore, I am perfectly willing with the chairman to raise the rate on some of these magazines, but I believe that the rate suggested is too high. I further believe that under the new railway mail pay law great economies can be effected in transportation of second-class mail, especially periodicals issued less frequently than weekly. These can be carried at freight rates, and a dollar a hundred will carry freight a long distance. The freight rate on grain from Minnesota to New York is only 25 cents per hundred. If we can get freight rates as the new law authorizes on periodicals, we can in some instances carry them for what they now pay without loss.

Another thing: I have been reading the parcel-post law of 1913 and one thing suggested itself to my mind, to wit: Has not the Postmaster General, under the parcel-post law, the right in his discretion to take newspapers out of the second class and put them into the fourth class, the same as he did in the case of books, which he took out of the third class and put into the fourth class?

The discretion is so broad that it seems to me that it includes that authority. He is directed to do everything, must change the classification and the rates, when it is necessary, in order to make the parcel post self-sustaining. Now, if he can save a loss of $70,000,00 a year by applying the proposed rates, as the gentleman says, why for these years has not this authority under the parcel-post law been exercised?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman mean to say that he thinks that under that statute the Postmaster General defines first and second and third class mails, that under the discretion that is given him he could change the second class into fourth class?

Does the gentleman think he could compare the transfer of the second-class mail with that?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am not making this as an assertion of fact, but as my opinion of the law. I noticed that the Postmaster General took books out of one class and put them into another class, and the thought struck me that he could also take newspapers out of one class and put them into another class.

Mr. MOON. There is not a word in the statute giving him such power. The gentleman is speaking of third-class matter?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. The parcel post is fourth-class matter.

Mr. MOON. That is purely catalogues and advertising.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no. The gentleman is mistaken. All books go by parcel post. The only limitation that is on it is this, that if a book does not weigh over a certain number of ounces——

Mr. MOON. Let us get at that question. That is because of the fact that the matter is fourth-class matter, which the parcel post carries.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; they took books out of one class and put them in another, but not all books; the order limits it, and I have the order here:

ORDER OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, December 6, 1913.

(Order No. 7705.)

On and after March 16, 1914, the classification of articles mailable under section 8 of the act of August 24, 1912, authorizing the establishment of the Parcel Post Service, shall be extended so as to include books. The rate of postage on books weighing 8 ounces or less shall be 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof, and on those weighing in excess of 8 ounces the regular zone rate shall apply.

All regulations or parts of regulations in conflict therewith are hereby rescinded.

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

The classification of articles mailable, as well as the weight limit, the rates of postage, zone or zones, and other conditions of mailability under this act, if the Postmaster General shall find on experience that they or any of them are such as to prevent the shipment of articles desirable or to permanently render the cost of the service greater than the receipts of the revenue therefrom, he is hereby authorized, subject to the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission after investigation, to reform from time to time such classification, weight limit, rates, zone or zones or conditions, or either, in order to promote the service to the public or to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Alabama proceeds, I would like to ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks leave to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] is recognized.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up many minutes of the time of the committee. There is only one subject that I want to discuss, and that briefly. It is the question of the pneumatic-tube service.

There are a great many Members of the House, I imagine, who have not given special attention to this subject. I have heard a number of Members say to-day that they were not prepared to say whether or not they ought to vote with the committee, which means a discontinuance of practically all of the pneumatic-tube service, or vote for the amendment to continue it and extend it from time to time. I have spent a great deal of time during the last four years in an effort to fairly determine what was the proper thing to do concerning this subject. I was appointed as a member of the joint Pneumatic Tube Postal Commission, under and by virtue of the authority conferred upon the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, approved August 24, 1912.

This subject in the very nature of things required both time and study. Our commission visited the cities of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, and the actual operation of the tube was witnessed in each of the cities named. A great deal of testimony from experts of the Post Office Department, those representing the pneumatic-tube corporation, and expert accountants not connected with either the Post Office Department or pneumatic-tube corporation was gathered.

I have no doubt that if the Members of this body had taken or would take the trouble to read the report and the testimony taken, they would have no doubt for a moment that the Government is paying entirely too much for a service that does not approximate in value $17,000 per mile per annum, and certainly if the tube could be seen in operation it would convince one beyond the shadow of a doubt that it is a luxury and not a necessity. It may be that because we are voting the money of those other than ourselves we can afford to shut our eyes to the facts and view the question from a sentimental point of view, and say that it is all right to allow the Government to continue to spend the people's money to the amount of $17,000 per mile per annum for fifty-odd miles of 8-inch pneumatic tube, notwithstanding substantially the same service can be given for one-third of what it costs to operate the tube.

All the testimony shows, and, in fact, it is practically admitted, that if there be a difference in the time of delivery by the automobile service and that of the pneumatic-tube service, it amounts only to the difference of from four to five minutes as a time saver. These tests have been made when the pneumatic-tube people knew that it was competing with the automobile service and that the Post Office Department was having these tests made with a view of changing to automobile service, and I take it that it is fair to assume the best efforts and the quickest deliveries that could be made were made under these tests. In some of the tests the automobile delivery was quicker than the pneumatic-tube delivery, but taking all the tests on an average it would not show over from two to four minutes in favor of delivery by the tube system. I am not concerned whether deliveries be made by automobiles or pneumatic tubes. My only concern is, What is the best and proper method of making these deliveries? If the time of deliveries saved amounts to no more than 3, 4, 5, or, indeed, 10 minutes, and we can save by adopting one of the other methods two-thirds of what is now being paid out by the Government, I am forced to the conclusion we should take the cheaper.

You take a mass of mail for outgoing trains. It must be tied up in small packages to go in the containers, and it must be borne in mind that the tubes are only 8-inch tubes. Each package must be placed in the containers and sent through the tube to the station. At the station the packages must be placed in the mail sacks before delivery to the outgoing trains. In the post offices the clerks must first tie up these packages, and I contend that while tying them up they can be placed in sacks and these sacks placed in an automobile truck and delivered to the station ready to be placed on the train practically in the same time that the mail is being sent through the tube. In handling it in this way we do the same service for two-thirds less than it costs to do it by the tube system.

I see a friend on the other side shake his head. If he has seen the tubes in operation, he knows that what I say is true. I am willing to put him on the stand. I can prove by him that if you have 3 or 500 pounds of mail and undertake to handle it through the tubes, I will take the same number of pounds in an automobile truck and beat him to the point of delivery by the use of an automobile, and I will do the service for one-third of what it is now costing to handle it through the tube. If he beats me by the pneumatic-tube delivery, it will be by only a very few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have three minutes more.

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, during the short time I have been here I have observed that when we undertake reform in the interest of the people as against the people of the preferred classes we are met always with the prediction that direful results will befall the country if these reforms are put into effect.

When we began the preparation of the parcel-post legislation all Members of Congress, and especially the members of the Post Office Committee, of which I have been a member since coming to Congress, were flooded with petitions, letters, and memorials from different societies, organizations, merchants, manufacturers, and others predicting that this legislation would bankrupt the Government and put out of business the merchants in the smaller towns throughout the country.

Now, in discussing this phase of the question, I am not going to undertake to make a party matter of it. Members on both sides of this House differed as to what was the proper thing to do, and I will say that they differed honestly. The point I make is this: That notwithstanding these predictions of the calamity that would befall us, we went to work and brought out a parcel-post bill, which has been in a measure perfected from time to time, and I dare say that a number of the commercial bodies and other organizations, merchants, and others who did all that was within their power to prevent this legislation would now be active in their opposition to its repeal. The good that the parcel-post legislation has brought to the masses of the people is untold.

I merely make mention of this in order to show you the importance of each Member of this body studying these great questions, with a view to reaching a correct conclusion, and when he reaches an honest conclusion stand by it, regardless of adverse criticism from Members or otherwise.

We are told that if we discontinue the pneumatic-tube service it will be ruinous to certain business interests in this country. Gentlemen, this can not be true. If all the commercial organizations in the United States should tell me that a mere delay of three or four minutes in the matter of delivery of a letter would be disastrous to the great business interests of the country, I could not agree to this conclusion.

As far back as October 3, 1914, when the pneumatic-tube commission, which I have mentioned, made its final report I was unable to agree with Senator HOKE SMITH and Gen. Joseph Stewart, then Assistant Postmaster General, who made the majority report for this commission that this Government should purchase the fifty-odd miles of 8-inch pneumatic tubes now being leased by the Government. The price that it would cost to purchase this is enormous, and it would have taken untold years for Congress to have ever been able to explain on any fair business basis why it had done so.

The tube system originally was inaugurated for commercial purposes, and it was a dismal failure from a commercial standpoint. Necessarily a failure, because the 8-inch tube is too small to perform any service on a paying basis. It must be borne in mind that these tubes can not carry anything except letters and very small packages. It can never be utilized for second-class mail; and when you realize that last year we handled 1,400,000,000 pounds of second-class mail—and in this connection I might say handled it at a great loss to the Government—how can we hope or can it be reasonably expected that the tube, even if owned by the Government, could ever take care of this great increase in the weight of our mail? This class of mail must be handled by automobile truck or some other method, and I contend that if we must be forced to use the automobile service for the handling of this class of mail, why can we not save many thousands of dollars to the Government by adopting a faster schedule of automobiles for first-class mail, and thereby make this great saving to the people.

The Post Office Department, we must assume, have given much thought and study to this question and are anxious to do the best they can for the service and the whole people. I can not conceive of a great department of this Government like the Post Office Department recommending to Congress that they do a thing that would prove disastrous to the mail facilities of this country.

An effort has been made to criticize the present Postmaster General as to his handling of the postal affairs of the Government. To my mind, a Member of Congress who decides for or against any of these great postal reforms because they are proposed by a Democratic Postmaster General, or decides for or against them because they are not proposed by a Republican Postmaster General, is better suited to be sent to some small vacant spot out in the mountains to cultivate a small tract of unimproved land, provided he could borrow a little money from the Federal Government under the provisions of the Federal farm-loan act rather than be sent here to represent the people in Congress. [Laughter.]

I sincerely trust that the amendment now proposed to continue and extend the pneumatic-tube service will not prevail.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the tleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS]. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no thought of being able to convert those of my peers, who are here with an intelligent thought of their own, and their minds fully made up on this question, but I merely want to put myself on record against what is commonly called the zone system for the distribution of mail. Our whole postal system, I am glad to say, is founded upon the theory of serving the public for public good and not for profit. The original mail carrier in the early ages of government was a military courier, going from the seat of government to the military outposts. He became not only the message carrier for government but the news and information carrier for private citizens and soldiers about the military posts. Beginning in this crude way we have the postal system—the postmaster and the post office getting their names from the origin of the service. It is consoling to see the wonderful development into which the postal service of all the world has grown. The distribution of our mails is one of the methods of our public education. Whatever impedes or cripples that process retards to that extent our educational facilities and turns the wheels of progress backward.

I think I see in the zone system the beginning of a program which, if followed to its ultimate conclusion, would provincialize and sectionalize this Republic, destroy that universal communication and unification of thought which must make us one great family in this Republic. The hope of this Republic rests upon our whole population and all our immigration going into a melting pot and coming out full-fledged American citizens, and our universal Postal System is one of the necessary means to that end.

We must encourage and support all means of education that crystallizes the public conscience into national thought, national pulse, and the fullest fruition of the American spirit, and to penalize the man who lives in a distant sphere by making him pay extra for his intelligence and his part of the national information is not only unjust to him, but is impolitic and unwise as a governmental policy.

Our Postal System must not be controlled merely by the curves of the dollar mark. If we are to look alone to the question of profit and the question of cost, then the question of public intelligence and general information must be eliminated and all our mail transactions tested by the profit and loss account, and this would mean the entire demoralization and the ultimate destruction and overthrow of our national life.

If the zone system had been in operation throughout the past years of our Republic, I make bold to express the conviction that the Indian and the buffalo would still be roaming over the great western portion of this grand country, for if the pioneer citizen had been cut off from all means of communication back home, except when he was able to foot the bills and make good its cost, our outposts would have been slow indeed to move forward. The great prairies and plateaus that lie between the Atlantic and the Pacific, whose wonderful harvests sustain millions to-day, would have remained a barren and bleak frontier, untouched by the hand of the husbandman.

In the early days of the Republic, seeing the wisdom of the public dissemination of intelligence bringing the remote sections of the country into direct contact with the cities and centers of civilization, a law was passed providing that each county seat in the United States should have a daily-mail service.

The settlement of the Mexican War and the discovery of gold on the Pacific coast brought under our flag many county seats several hundred miles apart, some of them reaching almost to a thousand miles apart in the western wilds. I think I call to mind in the prosecution of the star-route frauds, under what is referred to in the papers of that day as the Dorsey scandal, the testimony showed that in routes running from Fort Worth, Tex., to Santa Fe, N. Mex., and from Missouri River points to the "Golden West" in California, it had cost this Government sums ranging at times from $2 to $6 a letter to carry the mail, and stage coaches and stage stands had to be guarded by the military branch of the Government to keep mail robbers and Indian marauders away.

Carping critics and anxious economists howled in heroic chorus that such a program was not only unwise but bankrupting in its effect, but the answer of the thoughtful statesmen of the national heart and conscience of the country was that the same Government that paid as high as $6 a letter to carry the mails across the West got nearly 600 letters carried for a dollar between Chicago and New York, and when the equation was made all the people were served and the heart and conscience of the country kept in touch.

The result is to-day that the Atlantic and Pacific, through our postal system, are brought face to face, and the man on the Atlantic shore and the man on the Pacific shore are actual neighbors and members of the same family, often in daily communication.

Under the national postage-stamp system, limited only by the boundary lines of the Republic in its legal-tender transit, Uncle Sam marched in steady progress from the Atlantic, crossing the Rocky Mountains and the Cascades, and bathed his face in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman from Texas a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Yes, certainly; I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOON. I understand the gentleman is opposed to the zone system. Is he opposed to the rates of the second-class mail matter?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I think that might be adjusted very readily and not apply the zone system, which, in my judgment, will demoralize and distract our whole postal communication. I think a more equitable burden between the letter postage and the postage of newspapers, periodicals, and journals should be had, and I would be willing to see a reasonable adjustment of the rates of second-class matter, and I would be glad to see this Republic at one full swoop put the whole of our letter postage at 1 cent and enlarge and broaden our City and Rural Delivery Systems.

Mr. MOON. If you did that you would have a deficiency of $100,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. If so, I would make up that deficiency in some other branch of governmental revenues and by adjusting rates of second-class matter; but as to a deficiency of $100,000,000, I would feel that if that money had been spent in bringing up the standard of national intelligence and information, broadening and expanding the public mind, and bringing the heart throbs of Maine and Florida and California and Carolina to beat in unison, while the enlightened conscience of the country swelled in patriotism, I would consider the money well spent. [Applause.]

The theory of measuring the movements of the Postal Service by the curves of a dollar mark has never appealed to me as wise or salutary. I can understand why a zone system might be properly applied to the parcel post, for this is an instance where the Government seeks to serve as a common carrier in a commercial way, and hence may be properly governed by the expense of the long and short haul.

I remember when the National Grange and the National Alliance made a clamorous and just demand for a rural-route service, the same kind of economists that we find frightened at the cost to-day, with such exaggerated fear of national bankruptcy, told us then that a universal rural-route service meant universal bankruptcy; but the system was installed, and to-day perhaps two-thirds of the homes in the Republic are readily served with a daily delivery, and this bill provides for the enlargement and extension of that service.

There is another side to this question that appeals to me with unusual force, and that is the question of our great fraternal, religious, vocational, and national papers and journals. I am told from 600 to 1,000 of these are now struggling for their existence under the increased expense of print papers and other materials.

The zone system would denationalize or destroy these papers and periodicals. This, in my judgment, would be a national calamity, for the hope of this Republic lies in the crystallization of a national conscience and a national character, and there is no power known to the nature of man that tends more to federate and bring into communal solidarity than the religious and fraternal feeling kept alive by those papers.

The printing press has been rightfully denominated as the greatest handmaid of civilization. It makes it possible for the dead to talk to the living for thousands of years after they are covered with clay. It makes it possible for the experiences and the information of past ages to be handed down to future ages. It makes it possible for the man in Maine to talk to the man in Texas a thousand years after death, and the daily and weekly messages printed on paper and sent throughout the world, with all their faults must ever remain one of the surest resources and firmest foundations for our future progress.

In the main, I think the present postal appropriation bill is an excellent piece of legislation. When I take into consideration the multifarious problems that confronted the committee in the make-up of this measure, I can truly compliment and congratulate them. I do not want to be considered partisan, but I can not let this opportunity pass without complimenting in full fervor Postmaster General Burleson on the preeminent success of his management of our Post Office Department. I am willing to yield my judgment to the judgment of the committee and the Postmaster General touching the very vexing problem of the pneumatic-tube systems for mail delivery in the cities. That question only involves methods of efficiency and economy, but in an effort to revamp this Republic and lay it off into zones and stratas, which would govern the distribution of our mail, I can not feel content without putting myself on record as against the problem and assigning a series of reasons therefor.

A 300-mile zone would separate the State of Texas between Texarkana and El Paso into three zones, and would cross-section the State from Orange to Dalhart into four zones, and the papers and journals of Texas, speaking for Texas and feeling the heart swell for Texas development, would be met at three or four dead lines by a governmental agent and checked back, no matter how important the message of information and intelligence they carried.

Having thus briefly stated my views, I want to thank the House and close my remarks.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, the provisions in the present Post Office bill on page 15, lines 14 and 15, steeped in provincialism, affect vitally the postal efficiency of Brooklyn, New York, Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, and Philadelphia. It means, if passed, that the pneumatic mail-tube service will be discontinued in every city except New York, and there it will be greatly curtailed and may be discontinued entirely upon six months' notice by the Postmaster General.

Much as I regard the personnel of my committee, I must confess that on the part of at least one of its members there was exhibited at the hearing on the subject of the pneumatic mail tubes a woeful lack of knowledge of local conditions in the city of New York.

This member of the committee, who lives far away from the glittering lights of Broadway, who never has mixed with the crowds in the loop district of Chicago, participated in the following colloquy.

Postmaster Morgan, of New York City, was on the stand. To him he propounded this question:

What do you want tubes in The Bronx for, anyway? You can use them only six months of the year.

Mr. MORGAN (courteously, but puzzled). What do you mean, Congressman? Why do you say we can use the tubes only six months?

My distinguished friend then said:

Well, The Bronx is only a summer resort. It is closed up six months of the year, I suppose.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. BENNET. I was in the cloakroom and did not quite catch that statement about The Bronx.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not agree with the statement which was made—that The Bronx is merely a summer resort.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood him to say it was a cocktail. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. There are only three States in the United States that have as large a population as Bronx County.

Mr. MOON. Who was the Member who was talking when that statement was made?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have too much regard for my colleague to mention his name.

The Bronx is one of the most progressive boroughs of the five boroughs which go to make up Greater New York, a city whose postal business reaches $37,000,000 and shows a profit of over $22,000,000 to the United States Government. This city, whose people are the most charitable on God's footstool; this city, whose people hate a provincial; this city, which rejoices in the material welfare and development of every other American city; this city, which is the business backbone of the Nation, is entitled to the best possible service, because it contributes one-ninth of the money which maintains the Postal Service of the United States.

The people and press of Greater New York are united in an honest effort to continue the pneumatic-tube mail service. No insidious lobby can control the actions of the great, useful, and independent Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, the Merchants' Association of New York, and the Brooklyn Civic Club, of which I have the honor of being a member. No insidious lobby can control the editorial comment of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, one of the best-edited and most fearless evening papers in this country. No insidious lobby can inspire the editors of every great daily newspaper published in New York City. [Applause.]

The Postmaster General stands unmasked in his efforts to cloud the issue by his cheap claptrap charge of an insidious lobby. The people of New York City want the pneumatic mail tubes continued because they expedite the delivery of the mail and benefit the people of every part of the country who do business with New York City or Europe, and because they protest the introduction of 300 or more automobiles on its congested streets, which will add to its almost unsolvable traffic problems. Last year there were 105 children killed on the streets of New York by motor trucks. Whether you come from the North, the South, the East, or the West, the big congested city or the quiet peaceful village, please do not cast a vote to-day which may indirectly result in the killing of hundreds of more young innocents on the streets of New York. This is the time to discuss other conditions and problems which exist in the Postal Service of our country.

Mr. LEWIS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. What percentage of the whole number of vehicles in New York City would 300 automobiles make?

Mr. GRIFFIN. There would be 300 more automobiles added to those already there.

Mr. LEWIS. But what would be the percentage? Would it not be negligible?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I can not say. I was not present at the hearings owing to severe illness. I understand from the testimony of Mr. Morgan before the committee that if the tubes are discontinued 300 more automobiles will be added to those already on the streets of New York City.

Mr. LEWIS. Will it be more than one-tenth of 1 per cent?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I can not say.

Mr. DALE of New York. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have not the time.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman is mistaken in the testimony before the committee.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am quoting from the New York Tribune of the 16th of December last. Your minutes were not printed until Monday.

Mr. DALE of New York. Is it not a fact that if we had the tubes in New York these 300 additional automobiles would be unnecessary?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is absolutely true. The abolition of the tubes would mean an increase of 300 more automobiles.

The report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1916, directs the attention of Congress "to the activities of certain organizations of postal employees, which are becoming more pronounced every year." The charge is made that the administration of the Postal Service is made extremely difficult by these activities and that the civil-service law as represented in the merit system is in danger of becoming nullified unless section 6 of the act of August 24, 1912, known as the antigag law, is repealed.

The report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General contains a tirade on the same subject matter, which is couched in terms and language that seem to be expressive of the personal rather than the official sentiment of the head of the department. Representatives of the postal organizations are referred to as "postal parasites whose existence depends upon their ability to arouse discord and dissension between the department officials and the employees."

Statements of this kind made in reports to Congress will no doubt cause an impression to be made on the minds of Members of both branches of Congress that can not help but prejudice the minds of those who are not familiar with the facts. I have made inquiry and a study of the Postal Service and the conditions surrounding the employees and will give in detail a few of my observations and a result of my investigation.

The attitude of the Post Office Department officials in the treatment of the employees has been antagonistic. The employees have been reminded that their place in the service was to attend to their duties as directed in the orders issued to them and that they should not meddle in the affairs of administering the service or in matters pertaining to their welfare or working conditions. This policy has created a state of unrest, resentment, and discontent and has destroyed the harmony and cooperation that should exist between the officials and the working force.

The Post Office officials came into office with no practical knowledge of the workings of the Postal Service, and at the very outset they assumed a superior and autocratic attitude toward the employees in all branches of the service. Post Office Department officials in former administrations invited the cooperation of the employees and their representatives, and friendly relations were established and much good resulted, both to the service and the men. The present order of things, however, has changed all this, and the employees have been reminded that their opinions were not wanted and would not be tolerated.

A policy of economy and retrenchment has been put into effect by the Post Office Department officials which has resulted in placing hardships on the shoulders of the men, and this policy has been persistently followed in an effort to cut down the expenditures and report a balance in the revenues. Every technicality of the law has been taken advantage of to further this policy of economy, and all at the expense of the employees. If it has been the desire of the officials to be in charge of a dissatisfied, discouraged, and discontented army of employees, they have succeeded admirably. Postmasters throughout the country have been urged through correspondence to economize in administering the work of their offices until these postmasters have been so harassed and intimidated that they have been reluctant in asking for sufficient help to conduct the service in a satisfactory manner.

The Railway Mail Service, under the charge of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, has had the working force so reduced that complaint is made that physical hardships are imposed on the employees in trying to carry on the service. It is charged that many of the railway mail clerks have been reduced in salary and transferred to points distant from their homes without any regard for their welfare or their official records. In a recent ruling the Second Assistant Postmaster General nullifies the promotion law for these railway post-office clerks, so that the intent of Congress to provide promotions to the highest grade after three years' service in the next lower grade regardless of the time the law went into effect is destroyed. This interpretation of the law is in line with the policy of economy, as it makes a saving of a few dollars by depriving these hard-working and deserving employees of their lawful promotions.

The Rural Delivery Service has come in for its share of the economy policy, and the whole service has been disorganized and is in a state of chaos. Routes have been curtailed and eliminated without regard to the desires of the patrons, and in many instances the rural citizens have been compelled to walk great distances in order to get their mail. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who so harshly criticizes the representatives of the employees in his report, is the representative of the Rural Delivery Service. Judging from the record he has made it would seem that if his energies were directed in trying to establish harmony and cooperation with the employees under his direction, instead of incurring their ill will, the Rural Delivery Service would benefit materially. This is the same official of the Post Office Department who assumed to criticize Congress, and which criticism brought forth well-merited rebuke from the Members of the Senate in the last session of Congress.

The rural letter carriers have had their routes lengthened and their pay withheld, contrary to the statute. If the recommendations of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General are followed, we are promised a further reduction in the number of routes and a more general demoralization of the Rural Delivery Service in order to effect a policy of economy.

The City Delivery Service has also been given attention in the program of economy and retrenchment. Orders and rules have been promulgated and crude innovations have been instituted in the service that have made the working conditions of the men one hardship after another. An order was put into effect by the department whereby post-office clerks and letter carriers who were off duty for a period of 150 days in any one year were automatically dropped from the service. It mattered not whether the employees were off duty on account of illness or as the result of an injury that incapacitated them from performing their duties. In this way the department quietly and without much trouble rid the service of many of the veteran employees who, through sickness or disability, were forced to remain from their duties more than the maximum time limit. This order resulted in untold hardship to many of the employees in the Postal Service, and was discontinued only after the attention of Congress was drawn to its ill effects on the employees and legislation was enacted to put an end to the inhuman practice. In the effort to have this adverse regulation abolished the press and the public played an important part.

Speed systems and efficiency methods, so called, are in force and effect in the post offices of the country, and the result is that employees are required to labor under the most nerve-racking, mental, and physical disadvantages. The systems would not be tolerated without protest in any industrial institution. Standards have been established for the employees which it has been demonstrated are a physical impossibility for the average man to keep up. In addition to the ordinary speed tests they have inaugurated another kind of test which is more trying on human nerves and mental balance than anything yet conceived. This test is made in secret on a day and at a time unknown to the employee. His mail is counted without his knowledge, and a record is made by the efficiency expert of the time that should be consumed in handling it and getting it in shape for delivery. A comparison is then made with the time consumed by the employee, as recorded in his report, and if the employee has not measured up to the requirements of the test he is charged with demerits and advised that his rating is not up to the standard. The tendency of this system is to have men constantly working at top speed in a machinelike manner and against the laws of nature. The systems have resulted in defeating the very purpose for which they were established. Genuine efficiency can not be secured from systems that wear out the human frame and result in fatigue and a breaking down of the health. It seems, however, that the department officials who are responsible for these conditions have no interest whatever in the matter of conserving the health and strength of the employees, and the practice of economy is carried on in order that a saving might be effected by a curtailment of the force ordinarily required to expedite the work.

Another system in vogue in post offices and authorized by the Post Office Department officials is the method pursued in its inspection division. The practices in force are absolutely un-

American and are an insult to the integrity of the great army of postal employees and should be modified. Men are secretly trailed and are watched, while performing their duties, from contrivances built in post offices containing peepholes. The system is obsolete, crude, and repulsive. In order that the employees can be kept under scrutiny every moment of their time, the toilets in post-office buildings are without doors and are otherwise exposed to the view of anyone passing through or using these rooms. It is an intolerable condition and one that should be stamped out by legislative enactment.

The employees in post offices are required to work in insanitary, unventilated, and inadequately lighted workrooms. Their health is unnecessarily sacrificed, and when they are overcome with disease or broken in health they are cast aside and new recruits take their places.

All through the workings of the innovations and systems prevalent in the Postal Service can be seen the spirit of economy and retrenchment. Nothing else is considered. The patriotic employees of the Postal Service who responded to the call of the President in June, 1916, for service in military or naval organizations were not immune from the ever-watchful eyes of the promoters of economy. Hardly were they on their way to the border before an order went forth from the department to drop them from the rolls of the Postal Service. Danger was seen in this order for the positions of these employees by Congress, and a provision was inserted in the Post Office appropriation bill approved by the President on July 28, 1916, directing the Post Office Department to hold the positions of these patriotic employees open for them. The officials, however, were not willing to give up their plans for a saving, and despite the law another order was issued in August, 1916, again directing that these men be dropped from the rolls. The whole purpose of the persistent efforts of the Post Office Department to have these men dropped from the rolls was to effect a scheme whereby a class of employees termed temporary regulars could be appointed, thereby saving approximately 7½ cents per hour.

Contrary to the classification act of 1907 regulating the salaries of post-office clerks and city letter carriers, the Post Office Department, through the First Assistant Postmaster General, in February, 1915, ordered all carriers assigned to collection duty reduced in salary to a maximum grade of $1,000 per annum. What hardships this order was responsible for can be estimated when we look back and remember what a storm of protest arose from the men affected by the order. The unfairness of this reduction in salary was recognized by the Congress when the matter was brought to their attention, and a resolution was appended to the Post Office appropriation bill for 1916 restoring these men to their former grades. This resolution corrected the injustice to the extent of placing the men back into their former grades of pay. However, the lost salary on account of the unmerited decrease covering a period of approximately nine months is not forthcoming, and there should be some provision made to have the amounts so deducted restored to the unfortunate employees who suffered by the adverse order of the department officials.

Just now complaints are reaching us that excessive overtime in post offices is being regularly required. The eight-hour law was put into effect with the object in view of giving these employees time in which to rest or otherwise devote to themselves and families. Now, through insufficient working forces these men must do overtime, for which very often they receive no pay. The very purpose for which the eight-hour law was enacted is defeated, and the growing practice should be eliminated. Overtime is sometimes necessary to the prompt handling of the mails, and in such emergencies the employees are ready and willing to do their part; but it is the unnecessary overtime which they are opposed to, and could be reduced to a minimum if the officials of the Post Office Department were so disposed.

In all of these arbitrary orders and rules of the post-office officials in experimenting with the service to make a surplus in the revenues we see hardships placed on the shoulders of the employees. The American people do not want a Postal Service reporting a big surplus if the employees are to pay for it through a physical and mental state of unrest, worry, and unfair working conditions.

Throughout the whole of the administration of the Postal Service by the present officials we see not one recommendation that had for its purpose the improvement of the conditions of the workers. Persistent efforts have been made to abolish the office of the assistant postmasters and do away with the positions altogether; the eight-hour law and the Sunday-closing law have been recommended for repeal; biennial promotions instead of annual advancement have been suggested; holiday service has been required when unnecessary for the satisfactory execution of the service; reduced pay for substitute carriers was recommended, and readjustments of postmasters' salaries were urged, which would mean in many cases a reduction.

We do not see any recommendations by these officials for a retirement measure to take care of the old and worn-out men and women in the service of the Government who have given the best years of their lives to the Postal Service and who are now being thrown out on the mercies of charity. Neither do we see a suggestion to look into the problem of the high cost of living and bring the salaries of these employees up to a fair standard. The Postmaster General, however, recommends to Congress that the four Assistant Postmasters General have their salaries raised from $5,000 to $7,200 per annum. No doubt the high cost of living as well as good service induced the Postmaster General to make these recommendations. I submit, however, that the low-salaried fellow is more in need of an increase in pay at this time of high prices than his more fortunate brother with an income of $5,000.

The Postmaster and his Fourth Assistant who are so inclined to criticize the organizations of these employees and their representatives could, if they so desired, learn just how much good to the employees their associations are and what burdens are lifted from the shoulders of the Government through the sick and death benefit features maintained by the employees through their organizations. Thousands of dollars are paid out each week in cases of sickness and accident by the benefit departments of these associations, and hundreds of familes have benefited through death benefits from their insurance organizations.

The officials of the Post Office Department could gain much advantageous information in the manner of treatment that should be accorded the employees if they were to pattern after a few of the Cabinet officers at the head of other departments. They could also gain much valuable knowledge of the relations that should exist between the department and the employees if they were inclined to seriously consider the declaration of President Wilson made at Shadow Lawn, N. J., September 22, 1916, to the Business Men's League, when he said:

> But the chief cloud that is on the domestic horizon is the unsatisfactory relations of capital and labor. There is only one way, gentlemen, in which the relations of capital and labor can be rendered satisfactory. That is by, in the first place, regarding labor as a human relationship of men with men; and, in the second place, to regard labor as a part of the general partnership of energy which is going to make for the success of business men and business enterprises in this country. So long as labor and capital stand antagonistic, the interests of both are injured and the prosperity of America is held back from the triumphs which are legitimately its own.
> Labor is not a commodity. It is a form of cooperation, and if I can make a man believe in me, know that I am just, know that I want to share the profits of success with him, I can get ten times as much out of him as if he thought I were his antagonist. And his labor is cheap at any price. That is the human side of it, and the human side extends to his conception, that the laboring man is a partner of his employer.

The Postmaster General issued a public statement on December 30, 1916, showing the magnitude of the service performed by the United States Postal Service in handling the Christmas mail. It was estimated by the Post Office Department statisticians that approximately 125,000,000 parcels weighing about 2 pounds apiece were mailed during the two weeks before Christmas—that is, for every man, woman, and child in the land fully 2½ pounds of parcel-post mail was received and delivered through the facilities of the Postal Service. These figures do not take into account the many millions of Christmas letters and post cards and the great volume of second-class mail matter that was handled by the employees. This great volume of mail matter was handled in an expeditious manner notwithstanding the unfavorable weather conditions which seriously delayed rail transportation in the most thickly populated sections of the country.

The efficiency experts were hidden away and the efficiency systems were thrown into the discard when the Post Office Department officials were confronted with the problem of moving the mails in a prompt and efficient manner. The loyalty and devotion of the employees to the immense task that confronted them mastered the situation as it always does in every emergency or when the occasion demands. It is to be regretted that the occasion of the holiday rush in the post offices could not be utilized by placing the "efficiency engineers" to work in the useful occupation of juggling mail sacks or carrying heavy loads of mail on their backs for delivery through the cold and sleet and snow. Now that the heavy work is over and the postal business will get back to normal conditions, we will hear from the chief of the efficiency bureau of some new system that has been evolved to worry the employees and to make them miserable in their everyday work.

When men are required to work overtime the effects are shown in their efficiency by a loss of desire to perform their work. The employees realize from experience that they are overcome with fatigue after peforming their regular day's work and they ask to be relieved of any unnecessary overtime. They are not desirous of working overtime for the extra pay they receive nor do they wish to make extra pay by being paid double time for all services performed in excess of eight hours. They prefer to do a fair day's work in a competent and efficient manner and would welcome the enactment of a penalty clause to the 8-in-10-hour law that would arbitrarily provide that their labor be finished at the end of eight hours. They realize, however, that contingencies arise which necessitates employees working beyond the eight-hour day in order that the mail shall be promptly collected, dispatched, and delivered. They are willing to do their fair share in emergencies of this kind and they do not complain of the ordinary necessities to be met in conducting the Postal Service. What the employees do object to is a vicious system which has grown up in the Postal Service during the past two years in which men are regularly required to work overtime. The purpose and intent for which the eight-hour law was enacted is destroyed through this system, and I trust that the Congress will enact legislation that will correct this abuse.

The postal employees are required to take rigid physical examinations before they can become eligible as applicants for the position of clerk or letter carrier. On account of this test the Postal Service is recruited with an exceptionally healthy and rugged body of men. Notwithstanding this, I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is an exceptionally large amount of time lost by these employees on account of sickness. This loss falls directly on the employees, as their pay ceases from the time they are unable to perform their duties. The fraternal organizations maintained by the postal employees have been under a serious drain on account of the excessive heavy demands that have been made on their sick-benefit funds. It is maintained that the health of these men break down prematurely on account of the increasing intensity of speed fostered by the efficiency system and the amount of overtime required to work. These two causes result first in fatigue and later in a breakdown of the human system.

The Postmaster General in his recent report drew the attention of Congress and the public to the fact that the Post Office Department has been conducted during the last fiscal year at a profit of approximately $5,000,000. If this surplus has been made at the expense of the health of the employees, it will not meet with the approval of the American people.

One of the most constructive pieces of legislation ever placed on the statutes was the new Federal workmen's compensation law, passed in the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and which was signed by the President on September 7, 1916. I have heard it stated by those who have made a close study of workmen's compensation acts and who were particularly interested in the McGillicuddy bill that it is the most scientific and most liberal compensation act in any country. On a roll call of the House there were only three dissenting votes to the passage of this bill. It covers all of the Government's civil employees, which number approximately one-half million. The law provides the injured with reasonable medical, surgical, and hospital service and supplies. In case of death the new act grants 35 per cent of the wages to the widow and an additional 10 per cent for each child, up to 66⅔ per cent in all, to cease only when the widow dies or remarries or when the child dies, marries, reaches the age of 18, or, if over 18 and incapable of self-support, becomes capable of self-support; for total disability the act allows 66⅔ per cent of wages during disability and for partial disability it allows 66⅔ per cent of the loss of earning power. In commenting on the bill when it was under consideration in the Senate, Senator SMITH of Georgia, who is well informed on workmen's compensation laws, is quoted as making this statement:

> I regard it as one of the most admirably prepared measures ever brought to my attention. I think it is about the first bill of any length I have ever read to which amendments did not at once occur to me.

The standards embodied in this measure places the United States as a leader in caring for the civil employees in its service by compensation for personal injuries.

The Sixty-fourth Congress could round out its usefulness and complete its brilliant record by the enactment of a law that will provide for the retirement of its superannuated civil-service employees. While this question is awaiting the action of the Congress, I commend to the Members of the House the bill H. R. 6915, which bill provides for relief of the superannuated employees in the Postal Service. It is a just and meritorious measure, and I ask my colleagues to read the bill carefully in order to be prepared to register their views on the measure when it is brought before the House for their consideration.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I can enlighten the members of this committee upon the many items in this bill more than what has been said to-day. I regret very much that any member of the committee at any time should undertake to bring politics into this bill. I think it is the inherent nature of my good friend from Minnesota, Mr. STEENERSON, to do so—that it is impossible for him to present his side of this bill without dragging the mire of politics into it.

I want to compliment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], a Republican and a member of this committee. Never have I heard him in the committee or on the floor of this House bring politics into the discussion of this bill. The gentleman from Minnesota gravely announced that he was going to prove that Mr. Burleson was a liar.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I decline to yield.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman has no authority to say that, and I object to the remark.

Mr. COX. I refuse to yield.

Mr. STEENERSON. I call the gentleman to order. I make the point of order. The gentleman accused me of saying that some one was a liar and I never used those words.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman did not use the words, a fair inference from the statement was to that effect—to the effect that the Postmaster General had falsified his report and made a report that did not correspond with the facts in the case. Mr. Chairman, the present Postmaster General needs no defense at my hands or from any other. He stands preeminent as Postmasters General. He will go down in history as one of the greatest Postmasters General this Nation ever had. He has demonstrated his ability by taking hold of a losing proposition, put it on a paying basis, gave the people better service than they ever had, increased salaries, got through more constructive legislation than has been done in the last quarter of a century.

I served on this committee under Postmaster General Hitchcock. I think he was a great Postmaster General, and time and again in the four years I served under him I defended him on the floor of the House against assaults made upon him by members of my own party. The gentleman from Minnesota undertook to criticize the Postmaster General's report and to prove that it was false, and consumed 1 hour and 23 minutes of the time; it was an utter failure, for he never adduced a single fact or a single figure to show that Mr. Burleson's report was erroneous when it said that during the last four years he had turned into the Treasury of the United States a surplus.

The gentleman from Minnesota can "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel" as long as he pleases, but he never will be able to disprove the facts in the case, but that in the last four years Postmaster General Burleson has turned into the Treasury of the United States a clear surplus of $3,388,308.97, a thing no Postmaster General has done in the last 50 years.

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. COX. I refuse to be interrupted. There are some things in this bill that I can not stand for. One is the item that was put in it by my esteemed friend from Chicago, Mr. MADDEN, which proposes to increase the salaries by automatically promoting the clerks in the fifth and sixth classes within the first and second class post offices. I can not support it for this reason: In the first place, I do not know whether we are going to be favored with a rule to make in order the amendment—the 10 and 5 per cent increases—which has gone on the appropriation bills heretofore. I have inquired of the chairman of my committee as to whether or not the Rules Committee is going to bring in a rule, and I can not find out there. I inquired of the Rules Committee as to whether they proposed to present a rule here or not, and I can not find out there. I may be wrong, but I am figuring that when this bill goes to the Senate, if the Senate follows up what we put on the legislative bill, they will logically put the 5 and 10 per cent increase on over there in this bill. If they do, then what is known as the Madden amendment, which automatically promotes clerks in the fifth and sixth classes in first and second class post offices, ought not to remain on the bill, because it will give them a double increase.

Now, if the Madden amendment obtains and should become a law, it would add to the expense of this bill $882,175, the proof of which I will take the liberty of inserting as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform me whether the committee framing the bill had in mind the horizontal raise of 5 and 10 per cent?

Mr. COX. I do not think the committee did.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did it make any recommendation for an increase, not considering the horizontal raise?

Mr. COX. Yes; that is what I am addressing myself to now. So when the bill is reached I shall make a point of order against that provision.

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, and the gentleman may as well get ready for an argument. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. We will cross that bridge when we get to it. Much has been said about pneumatic tubes. I shall discuss that very little. I want the Members who represent large cities to feel that I hold no animosity toward them whatever.

I am in favor of voting any provision which, in my judgment, will make the transportation of mails in the large cities more effective and efficient, but I am not in favor of voting a provision into this bill which, in my opinion, will not make the transportation of mail in the cities any more effective or efficent. There was a time when these pneumatic tubes no doubt served a very valuable purpose. That was a time before we had the auto trucks. The auto truck has revolutionized city deliveries in all branches of commercial life. That was true before the parcel-post system was worked out as thoroughly and as completely as it is now, and during that period of time it possibly may be that the pneumatic tubes served a valuable purpose in the transportation of first-class mail in the cities but the coming of the automobile and the working out of the parcel-post system as completely as it is to-day, in my opinion, and I base that on facts and opinions gathered by postal experts, has completely dispensed with the necessity for the pneumatic tubes in the various cities.

The pneumatic-tube service has had a varied and checkered career. It has had a hard and difficult time to attach itself to Post Office appropriation bills. It began in 1893. Just how and why the first tube of fifty-six one-hundredths of a mile was built in the city of Philadelphia I do not know, because we have no proof showing why it was built. That was turned over to the Government of the United States for one year free of charge. In 1894 the Government began to pay rent for that tube and paid that year $4,000 for this fifty-six one-hundredths of a mile. The Post Office appropriation bill for the year 1897 contained an item of $35,000 for the transportation of mail by the pneumatic tubes or otherwise, and here I want to call the attention of the Members specifically to one point and I hope they will remember it: The Second Assistant Postmaster General in his report in the year 1897 said that if it were possible to construct tubes large enough to convey a sack or a pouch of mail at a time they might be of some importance in the transportation of mail, but he said that was impracticable on account of the cost of construction. He said that if in some of the larger cities the pneumatic tubes were constructed 10 inches in diameter he thought in all human probability it would relieve from 65 to 70 per cent of the trips made by wagons in the large congested cities. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have no 10-inch tubes in force now. The Second Assistant Postmaster General at that time was asking for a tube that was large enough to carry a sack of mail through it. He said that was not practicable, and he said that if we could get a tube 10 inches in diameter in all human probability it would help some. We have never gotten a tube 10 inches in diameter, except for a few miles of tubes in the city of Boston which were originally constructed for commercial purposes and proved a dismal failure and were later dumped on the Government for mail purposes and are now proving to be worthless for this purpose. The tubes we have to-day are 8-inch tubes, with containers 6¼ inches in diameter and 21 inches long.

The Post Office appropriation bill for the year 1898 carried an item of $150,000 for the extension of the pneumatic-tube service in various cities of the United States. In 1899 Congress, very suspicious of the pneumatic-tube process, very leary, very watchful as to whether it was going to be effective, incorporated a provision in the Post Office appropriation bill prohibiting the use of pneumatic tubes in these cities where they now have them. We had no pneumatic-tube service in the United States between the close of the fiscal year 1900 until the beginning of the fiscal year 1903, and so suspicious was Congress as to the success of the service that in 1898 it appointed a commission to study and investigate the question, composed of some of the ablest men in Congress. The men who investigated that in 1898 were headed by Edward O. Wolcott. I do not remember whether he was ever a Member of this House or not. Then, there were W. B. Allison, THOMAS S. MARTIN, E. E. Lloyd, W. H. Moody. There are men here now who served in this House with Mr. Moody, an excellent gentleman, a man of unquestioned ability, a man who went from this House to become the Secretary of the Navy, and who later went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and who was retired, if I recall correctly, two or three years ago, or perhaps more, by a bill passed by Congress, because of his failing health. Then, there were T. C. Catchings and W. H. Fleming. I have heard statements made here this evening time and again by various Members discussing this to the effect that every commission that has ever investigated the tube question reported in favor of it. I shall put in my speech the report of this committee recommending against the further extension of it, recommending against the continuance of it. That report was in 1901, and right in that connection I shall insert and make a part of my remarks some very interesting reading, and I hope some of the gentlemen here will take the time to read it. These companies have had rather rough sledding. They are coming to this Congress under suspicion.

At one time we had as Second Assistant Postmaster General a Mr. Nielson—I do not know him. It is a rather significant fact that within a period of about one month's time after he quit serving as Second Assistant Postmaster General he accepted employment at the hands of the pneumatic-tube people here in Washington, at a nominal salary of $1,000 a year, and was given $10,000 worth of stock for his service. I do not impute that condition of affairs is being carried forward to-day at all, but that is the way these tubes were originally fastened on the Government. They were originally conceived in sin and born in wickedness. You are asked to do a plain, open proposition here, and that plain proposition is this and no more, to vote to continue this appropriation in order to make the stock of these pneumatic tubes worth 100 cents on the dollar. Are you willing to pay the price? One gentleman gets up here, and he argues in favor of the tubes on the ground that it facilitates the transportation of the mail. That is not so. That argument is completely destroyed and met by every fact in the case. Another gentleman undertakes to justify his vote upon the ground that unless we continue this appropriation this stock is going to be worthless. That may be true, but I have no sympathy or patience with any man who will invest his money in a one-man purchasing concern. Nobody can use these tubes except the Post Office Department. They were originally built for commercial purposes in the city of Boston, tried out, and found to be dismal failures.

Now, the argument has been made here, or it may be made, that foreign Governments have tubes. That is not so. Any man who has ever looked into it knows it is not so. It is made for the sole purpose of deliberately deceiving men when they come to vote upon this proposition. Here are the facts. Berlin, Paris, and London, and a few more foreign cities have a small, 3-inch tube, and the only mail that they carry is small telegrams, and they charge 6 cents for every telegram that goes through those tubes.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield? Does not the gentleman know in London they are building now——

Mr. COX. No; I do not know it, and the gentleman does not know it. He does not know anything of the kind because they——

Mr. BENNET. Of six and a half miles——

Mr. COX. It is not true.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. COX. No; I am not mistaken. I have looked this question up and the gentleman has not.

Mr. BENNET. I have looked it up.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield further. Here is what occurred, and here are the facts in the case. Before the European war broke out foreign representatives in Berlin, Paris, and London sent their representatives over here to study our system of 8-inch tubes. After they came here they turned them down cold, because they saw they were failures over here. I have no doubt but what those cities in Europe have contemplated building an underground railroad to carry mail. They have contemplated that, but they have never begun it. They have not done it, and the only tubes that are now being used by any foreign powers are exactly as I related—the little 3-inch tubes. I imagine they are very much like our Lampson conveyors used in the department stores and banks of this country. Now, that is about all there is in this tube business.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. COX. I can not yield but for a question.

Mr. TILSON. I just wish to ask the gentleman if there are any underground endless-chain carriers constructed for post-office work?

Mr. COX. No. If these tubes are a success, here is a great city like New York, which is practically tunneled, and if the commercial men in the city of New York thought they were a success, even for commercial purposes, everybody with a thimbleful of sense knows it would be a network of tubes in the subways of New York, but they know they are failures. Now, to sum the matter up, there is but one thing in this whole proposition, and when you come to vote for it you had better look it squarely in the face. If you want to vote to make this stock worth a hundred cents on the dollar and run your arm into the Treasury of the United States by your vote, you vote it. It is the only ground on which you can justify it. We might as well be plain about it.

Mr. TILSON. Has that been the basis upon which the vote was justified heretofore?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has not the gentleman voted for it?

Mr. COX. Yes; but I must confess I never knew as much about it as I think I know now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? If the gentleman will permit me, I will say there were contracts entered into——

Mr. COX. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Between the Post Office Department and these private companies that could be enforced in the Court of Claims if the money was not voted.

Mr. COX. As I said a moment ago, in 1908 the Post Office appropriation bill carried an item of $500,000 in obedience to the law which had been passed prior to that time, and the administration entered into a four-year contract which carried it to 1907. In 1906, the department entered into another contract for 10 years which carried it up to 1916, a year ago. Now, the contracts are dead, or will be on the 4th of March. This is not the only committee that has reported against these tubes. I have a lot of confidence in the post-office inspectors, and away back in 1907 the post-office inspector said: "This is the most expensive method of mail transportation at the present time in use, and the inspectors very much doubt whether the advantages obtained are commensurate with the heavy expense." That is not all. In 1912, Congress authorized a commission, still in doubt—still doubting the wisdom and propriety of appropriating money to carry the mail at a rate of $17,000 a mile—in 1912, Congress passed a Postal Commission to study these tubes with a view to see whether Congress should purchase them or not. On that committee were Senator SMITH of Georgia; Senator Guggenheim, of Colorado, who served but a short time and resigned; Senator Bradley, of Kentucky, who later died before making his report. On it was Mr. BLACKMON, of the House, and Mr. Victor Murdock, of Kansas.

Now, you have heard it said in the arguments—or you will hear it said before we get through—that every committee that has been appointed to look after this thing has always reported favorably on the pneumatic tubes. That commission was not appointed at all with a view of seeing whether the Government should continue the lease of these tubes, but it was appointed solely for the purpose of seeing whether the Government should buy these tubes outright or not. That was a divided report. Senator SMITH and Mr. Stewart, who was then Second Assistant Postmaster General, were in favor of it. Mr. BLACKMON reported squarely against it. Mr. Murdock—I have not been able to get his report, but he did not agree in the majority report. So the truth of the matter is that every commission, be it a congressional commission or a commission appointed by the Post Office Department, to look into the feasibility of the tubes, without a dissenting voice, as I recall now, has reported against their continuation. Now, there are 3,500 stockholders in these five concerns. There are two companies here. One owns the Philadelphia concern, one owns the Brooklyn, the New York, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis concern. In these five cities there are five separate corporations, and those five separate corporations are held by a holding company again, so the truth of the matter is that there are six corporations operating in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis.

If you desire to vote to hold up a dying proposition and feel that you are justified in going into the Treasury of the United States to get the Treasury to pay the debt, so vote.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the gentleman say that these tubes have been costing $17,000 a mile?

Mr. COX. Absolutely.

Mr. LEWIS. That is more than the railroads get.

Mr. COX. It is argued here that these tubes have been the means of increasing the first-class mail. It is not so at all. Here are the facts: In the last 10 years the postal receipts of the city of New York have increased 92.08 per cent; Chicago, 108.93; Philadelphia, 76.14; Boston, 82.36; St. Louis, 42.25; Brooklyn, 77.71, or an average increase for the last 10 years of 89 per cent, and these are the cities, mark you, gentlemen, that have pneumatic tubes. What is the average postal increase in the six other largest cities that do not have these tubes? Cleveland, Ohio, in the last 10 years has increased its postal receipts 183.18 per cent; San Francisco, 103.91; Detroit, 162; Kansas City, 135.36; Cincinnati, 57.62; or an average of 114 per cent. And yet none of these six cities I have named have pneumatic tubes. What becomes of the argument that the pneumatic tube increases the first-class postage in the city where it is used? It falls to the ground when it is followed out to its last and logical conclusion.

I want to compliment my friend from Massachusetts, Mr. TAGUE. He has made a hard, determined, and conscientious fight from his viewpoint in order to maintain these tubes, both in the committee and on the floor of the House. I am not going to dispute at all the figures which he put in the RECORD the other day. But a commission of postal experts was appointed in 1916, composed of Joe P. Johnson, chief inspector, and J. C. Koons, W. S. Ryan, and I. T. Mullin, four men the very mention of whose names carries honesty, probity, justice, intelligence, knowledge, wisdom. These men have no interest in these tubes at all, but they have every interest in the efficiency and the efficacy of the mail service. And if these men believed for one moment that the pneumatic tubes increased mail deliveries in these cities, I have no doubt they would have reported in favor of them. What did they report? I hope some of you, at least, will listen to this, because, while it is a small item—it is only about a half million of dollars, and that is all that you may be called upon to vote, and as we are voting here billions, it does not mean much; but, in my opinion, every dollar that is appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States should have a principle behind it.

By an actual test made by Joe P. Johnson, J. C. Koons, W. S. Ryan, and I. T. Mullen, a committee of postal experts appointed to make the test between tubes and automobiles in conveying mail in various cities where they have the tubes, in the test made at Chicago on July 6, 1916, on train No. 22, Chicago & Carbondale Railway post office, it required 25 minutes from the time the train arrived at the station to deliver the mail to the post office by tubes. On July 8, the same train, mail was dispatched by automobile from the depot and delivered into the workroom of the post office in 14 minutes. On July 6, Chicago & Huron Railroad, it required 33 minutes after the arrival of the train to deliver the mail to the post office by means of the tubes. On July 7, the same train arriving at the city of Chicago, the mail was dispatched from the train to the post office by automobile in 20 minutes. On July 6, Chicago & Minneapolis Railroad, it required 20 minutes to deliver the mail to the post office by tubes after the train arrived. On July 7, the same train arriving at Chicago, the mail was delivered by automobile at the post office in 13 minutes. On July 6, New York and Chicago railway post office, arriving at Chicago, it required 27 minutes to put the mail in the post office by tubes. On July 7, the same train, the mail was dispatched by automobile from the depot to post office in 11 minutes after the train arrived. On July 8, 1916, mail dispatched by pneumatic tubes from post office was received at the Twentieth Street Postal Station in 10 minutes. On July 10 an automobile carried the mail between these two points in the same time. From Chicago post office to Armour Postal Station it required the tubes 20 minutes to deliver the mail, while an automobile made the delivery in 14½ minutes. From the Chicago post office by tubes to the Stock Yard Station the tubes consumed 21 minutes, while the automobile delivered it in 17 minutes. From the Chicago post office to Chicago Avenue Postal Station tubes delivered the mail in 9 minutes, automobiles in 9½ minutes.

New York and Pittsburgh railway mail post office arrived at North Philadelphia and dispatched mail to the main office by tubes, requiring 24 minutes to deliver the mail after arrival of train. Same train on next day, mail delivered from depot to post office by automobile in 19 minutes.

Boston, Springfield, and New York R. P. O. arrived in Boston, mail dispatched from main office by tubes to South Station, requiring 4 minutes and 30 seconds time. On the same day a pouch of mail was dispatched by automobile from the post office to South Station, making the trip in 3 minutes and 40 seconds. The Rockport and Boston R. P. O.: On July 28 mail was dispatched from the post office to the train by tubes. Time required, 6 minutes and 30 seconds. On the same day mail was dispatched from the post office by automobile for the same train; time required, 5 minutes and 5 seconds. Boston and Albany R. P. O. arrived at Boston, mail was dispatched by tube to the post office; time required, 16 minutes and 50 seconds. On same day automobile carried the mail in 13 minutes.

In tests made from post office to Uphams Corner to dispatch by tubes it required 17 minutes and 60 seconds. On the same date to dispatch mail by automobile between the same two points, 13 minutes and 50 seconds. On July 30 mail from Boston-Providence R. P. O. was dispatched from depot to post office through tubes; time required, 42 minutes 53 seconds. August 6 same train mail was dispatched from depot to post office by automobile; time required, 14 minutes and 52 seconds.

Continuous flow is not characteristic of the movement of mail, which fluctuates according to the schedules of arrivals and departures of trains and the schedules of collections and delivery by carriers. This requires elasticity in the facilities for handling and transporting mail which is not provided sufficiently for by pneumatic tubes. For example, if 1,000 pounds of letter mail is received on one train for the main office a sufficient number of clerks may be assigned to its distribution to prepare it quickly for dispatch by pneumatic tubes, but the capacity of the tubes is inflexible and 50 minutes will elapse before the container with the last portion of such quantity is dispatched. If the distance to be traveled is 1 mile, an automobile truck traveling at the rate of 12 miles per hour will carry all this mail and the newspapers and parcels as well and reach the same destination before one-tenth of the attenuated column of tube containers can get under way.

If these tests are true, there is no question but what the tubes are worthless and should not be continued. The postmaster at St. Louis says by an additional expenditure of $4,700 for autos a saving of $29,000 per year can be effected. The postmaster at Boston says a saving of $86,000 per year can be made by dispensing with the tubes. The postmaster at Chicago says a saving can be effected there of $140,000 per year, and in none of the cities will the service be affected if these tubes be discontinued.

In 1901 the joint commission appointed by Congress to investigate the Postal Service made a report to Congress on pneumatic-tube service, which concludes as follows:

> While we believe that all reasonable means should be utilized to insure the most rapid transmission and delivery of mails possible, we do not believe that pneumatic-tube service in its present stage of development is sufficiently expeditious to warrant the enormous outlay of public money that must be called for if this service were generally extended. We might enter the field of discussion and suggest that if a tube could be constructed and operated which would transmit a full pouch of mail from post office to railroad station, or railroad station to post office, for a reasonable amount of money, or that a smaller and less expensive tube might be used for city service for the transmission of letters from post-office station to post-office station, which should bear an additional charge to reimburse the Government, that it might be for the best interests of the service and the people to continue an appropriation for that purpose.
> But we prefer to confine ourselves to present conditions, and the conclusions that we have reached from our examinations and the testimony before us. We therefore recommend that under existing conditions the pneumatic-tube service be discontinued.

> (One member of the commission, Hon. William E. Chandler, dissented from this report.)

It is reported in the official record that a Mr. Milholland was one of the witnesses who testified before the commission. Mr. Milholland's testimony was taken on August 2, 1898, and may have had no small weight with the members of the joint commission who signed the report quoted above. He furnished first-hand information regarding the genesis of the pneumatic-tube mail contracts with the Government, and explained his connection with those undertakings both as a stockholder and officer of the two companies and as a contractor (in partnership with Congressman Belden, a member of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives) for the construction of the pneumatic tubes in Brooklyn.

The importance of this investigation by Congress into the merits of the pneumatic-tube service was so great that the existing contracts were subsequently permitted to lapse on June 30, 1901, and for one year thereafter the service was entirely suspended.

The following excerpts are made from the testimony of Mr. Milholland before the commission on August 2, 1898:

> By Mr. MOODY:
> Q. What are the names of the corporations owning the various pneumatic tubes in New York City?—A. There are two, the Tubular Dispatch Co. and the New York Mail & Newspaper Transportation Co.
>
> Q. Which runs the Government service?—A. Both. The Tubular Dispatch Co. has the contract for the tube from the Produce Exchange to this office, and from here to Forty-second Street; and the Newspaper Mail Transportation Co. has the contract from this office over to Brooklyn, which was opened to-day.
>
> Q. Are the companies allied in any way?—A. Yes, sir; they are allied. I am speaking now, in one sense, as an outsider, as I am no longer the president of either company, my relations having ceased.
>
> Q. What is your connection with either or both companies?—A. I am a stockholder in both of them, but I ceased to be president of the company some weeks ago.
>
> Q. You were president of both companies?—A. No; I was president of the Tubular Dispatch Co.
>
> Q. That was the earlier one?—A. Yes; it was the one that did the work in the Borough of Manhattan. I was a director in the other company.
>
> Q. Have you ceased to hold either office?—A. I am no longer president of the Tubular Dispatch Company, Mr. Gould having succeeded me some weeks ago. I am a director in the New York Newspaper Mail & Transportation Co. still.
>
> Q. Are the corporations entirely independent?—A. They are distinct organizations.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> Q. What is the length of the Brooklyn tube?—A. From here to Brooklyn post office, about a mile and three-quarters.
>
> Q. According as the tube runs, or the bee line?—A. It would be double that distance, the tube being over 3 miles in length, double circuit.
>
> Q. When you made the contract, which you did make at the beginning of this administration, what was the amount of the stock?—A. I think the Tubular Dispatch Co.'s stock at that time was precisely what it had been.
>
> Q. A million dollars?—A. I think there was no change, if I remember rightly; I don't think there was any change in the capital stock of the company.
>
> Q. Was it held very generally; was it distributed among a large number of persons or held by a comparative few?—A. It had been scattered considerably, and we tried to gather it up as much as we could, to get it into the hands of people who intended to do business.
> Q. The par value was $100 a share?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there any requirement in the charter that the cash should be paid in for the shares?—A. Just the ordinary requirement of the law—the general law.

Q. Does the general law require that stock shall be paid for in cash by the shareholders?—A. Any stock has to be sold at par, cash or property.

Q. I suppose the patents are part of the property which went to pay for the stock?—A. Undoubtedly; yes, sir.

By Mr. FAULKNER:

Q. As I understand it, this million dollars of stock was issued by the original company and its owners prior to the time that you became interested in it?—A. All of it.

Q. And you obtained the ownership by the purchase of that original stock?—A. Yes; from the various holders.

Q. And the million dollars of stock that existed as the capital stock of the company at the time you took hold of it was the original stock, and had passed out of the treasury of the company into the hands of the holders?—A. There was no treasury stock at all.

Q. Has there been any increase of stock?—A. We increased the capitalization from a million dollars to a million and a half.

Q. Was that sold from the treasury?—A. Three hundred thousand dollars of that increase went to purchase the Batcheller patent.

Q. That is, you paid the holder of that patent right $300,000?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was it?—A. The company that controlled these patents; that is, the Batcheller Pneumatic Tube Co., of West Virginia. That was for the right to use those patents here in New York City.

By Mr. MOODY:

Q. What becomes of the other $200,000 worth of shares?—A. Well, there was some of it went into construction. I could have answered that question with the utmost particularity if I had anticipated it.

Q. You mean that those who did the work were paid by the issuance of those shares?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many of those?—A. There was, to my knowledge, I think, $100,000 of that remaining stock went for the construction of the plant in part payment.

Q. Was it done by a construction company, or was it performed by the stockholders themselves?—A. It was a construction firm.

Q. Entirely independent of this corporation?—A. Yes, sir; it was not a construction company in the sense of being made up by the company.

Q. The transaction of taking this stock in part payment was considered an entirely legitimate business transaction?—A. Yes; most of it was paid in cash.

Q. The balance of the $500,000 increase went where?—A. $100,000 went for construction, and that was sold in cash, the stock selling at par.

Q. To old stockholders or new persons that became interested?—A. That went to a bond syndicate, the people who took the bonds.

Q. Then you issued bonds?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many bonds?—A. $600,000 of bonds were issued by the Tubular Dispatch Co.

Q. In return for what?—A. That was a mortgage on the plant.

Q. What was the consideration of the mortgage?—A. Sold it for cash.

Q. You mortgaged your plant, issued bonds secured by the mortgage, and you received dollar for dollar of the $600,000 secured?—A. The bonds didn't go at par.

Q. What did they go for?—A. The bonds were sold at 732.

By Mr. FAULKNER:

Q. 732 for each thousand?—A. The bonds were $1,000, and each one sold for 732 and accrued interest. The same amount would have been realized if the bonds had been sold at 90 and the stock had gone with the bonds as a bonus, but, as a matter of fact, the bonds were sold at 732 and the stock sold at par.

By Mr. MOODY:

Q. $600,000 worth of bonded indebtedness was held by certain persons, who at the same time received a certain amount of stock. How much stock?—A. $600,000 worth of bonds and $100,000 worth of stock.

Q. So that a person would receive six parts of bonds and one part of stock?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In fact, that $100,000 worth of stock was given as a bonus? That was the $100,000 you spoke of as sold for cash?—A. $300,000 for licenses, $100,000 that I have just disposed of now, and the other $100,000 went to the construction company.

Q. In fact—and I don't use the expression offensively—in the $700,000 of stock and bonds there is $100,000 of water?—A. That stock was sold for par and cash paid, and the bonds were sold at the price——

Q. Bonds were sold at less than par. But, of course, we all understand that that is only a fiction, because we never hear of a case where bonds sell for less than stock if there is to be a sacrifice either way.—A. I wish to state the case just exactly as it was.

Q. You adopted the device of selling your bonds for less than par, in order that you might comply with the State law by selling stock to the same individuals at par?—A. That is a fair statement of the case.

Q. Of course, the effect of that is that there is $700,000 worth of obligations, stock and bonds together, for which the company received $600,000 worth of property?—A. I don't know about that.

Q. That is the fact. You owe upon your stock and bonds $700,000 and have received less than that sum for them.—A. That seems to be a fair statement of the case.

Q. I understand the reason why you made the sacrifice where you did.—A. Precisely. We had been trying for 10 years to do something, as the Post Office Department gave us to understand that they had been trying to get this thing on its feet.

Q. You went into the concern at the time it took on new life, I take it?—A. I had been working on the matter irregularly from 1890, trying to get it into some shape all that time.

Q. The stock, I suppose, was gathered in at a small price?—A. There was some good figures paid for some of it.

Q. Had it a market value, a listed value?—A. None of it has ever been listed.

Q. When did you begin the service under the first contract—the tubular contract?—A. October 7, 1897.

Q. So that you have not been at work quite a year on it?—A. No; we began the work in August, and we opened the line in October.

Q. That was the first line opened in New York City?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I take it that your company has not been able to pay any dividends yet?—A. We have not.

Q. Have you some estimate of the cost of the construction of the plant up to the time you began operations?—A. I think the company has all of that data.

* * * * * * *

Q. (to witness). Now, then, the New York Mail & Newspaper Transportation Co.—what is the stock of that company?—A. One million dollars.

Q. Have there been any new issues of stock in that company?—A. The capital stock of the company was increased after we acquired it. When it went through it was $100,000 when we got hold of it. I know that it is now a million dollars, and I know that we raised it from $100,000.

Q. Was that by the issue of any stock?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What consideration was received from the old stock?—A. To get hold of the rights to use the Batcheller patents on the other side of the river, over on the part of the city to which this tube leads.

Q. That is, you paid the $700,000 or $900,000 to the company that controls that patent?—A. Not all of it. Six hundred and five thousand of the stock went to acquire the right to use these patents on the other side of the river.

Q. What was the rest of it used for?—A. For construction. But there is some in the treasury to-day. I could not tell you just how much, but there is some in the company to-day. Some went for the construction of this line just finished.

Q. Were there any bonds issued?—A. Two hundred thousand dollars of bonds.

Q. What was the consideration of those?—A. Those bonds were all taken by the construction firm—the contractors.

Q. In payment for the construction of the line?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Dollar for dollar?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They were paid money, in addition to that?—A. The contractors took stock and bonds for the work.

Q. Did the constructors of this work have any relations to the stockholders of the company?—A. They were outside in the sense of not having corporate relationship.

Q. In the sense of being stockholders?—A. I know what you have in mind. It was no construction company.

Q. No inside construction company?—A. A firm of contractors took the work.

Q. And took these bonds and stock?—A. I did not mean to say that there was not any in the firm that was not in the company, because that would not be a fact.

Q. The construction company took the stock and bonds as a business transaction?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. For the rights in New York and Brooklyn you have paid the Batcheller Co. how much?—A. The company wanted to have the right to operate in Brooklyn, and we had to acquire those rights. They had to be bought from the Tubular Dispatch Co., because the Tubular Dispatch Co., outside of the bridge, owned all the Batcheller rights.

Q. You paid $605,000 to this Batcheller Co.?—A. No; you will recollect in regard to my explanation a few moments ago relative to the Tubular Dispatch Co. that they had the rights.

Q. Then the total amount paid to the owners of the patent was how much?—A. They had $300,000 of the Tubular Dispatch Co.'s stock, and then there was under the old arangement, I don't know——

Q. Are the owners of this Batcheller patent stockholders in either of these corporations?—A. I don't think there is any considerable number of them—the majority of the stock is held by people in Philadelphia.

Q. What did your plant cost you?—A. Do you mean the price for the construction?

Q. What did it cost you when you had it all up and in operation?—A. The line over the Brooklyn Bridge? The only way that the company could answer that, I suppose, would be by stating the price that was paid to the contractors.

Q. Was the contract in a finished condition, ready for operation?—A. Precisely. The contractors are under obligations to put it in complete and finished operation. They were to do that for $200,000 worth of bonds and $200,000 worth of stock. The company held the contractors responsible for the completion of the work. The contractors are turning it over to the company to-day, and the company to the Government.

Q. How much could these tubes have been built for if the payment had been made in cash instead of stock and bonds?—A. I don't know.

* * * * * * *

Q. I would like to have you send for the books, if you will; the stock books of both companies, the records of the corporation, the minutes.—A. I will take pleasure in doing so. You asked me in regard to public men, and I said to you that Mr. Belden held bonds of the company, the Tubular Dispatch Co., and the New York Mail & Newspaper Transportation Co. I simply want to say that he is one of the members of the firm of Belden & Co., and while there were several sales of bonds to Mr. Belden, he has always stipulated that he should be relieved of the stock; but the firm of Belden & Co. did hold some of the stock of the New York Mail & Newspaper Transportation Co., but that was with the stipulation that he would not be a stockholder at any time, and that he should, individually, always be relieved of that. I also wanted to say in regard to one other public man—Mr. Charles Neilson—that after his retirement as Second Assistant Postmaster General he came here and an arrangement was made to have him represent the company at Washington for one year. He was made a director of the company, and was to look after matters at Washington. An arrangement was made for one year, and he was paid for that one year's service a thousand dollars, that being allowed him for traveling expenses, and he was also given $10,000 of the stock of the company. I want to cover that point in every possible way.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How long did this occur after his retirement from office?—A. It must have been a month or six weeks, or something like that.

Q. Was any arrangement made with Mr. Neilson at the time he was holding office?—A. None whatever.

Q. No discussion of this question whatever was had with him at that time?—A. None whatever; and furthermore, I would like to supplement what I said yesterday in regard to any Member of Congress being involved directly or indirectly in any manner with the company which would indicate any impropriety whatever. I wish to give any Member of Congress that I have ever had anything to do with complete exoneration.

By Mr. MOODY:

Q. What is Mr. Neilson's business now?—A. I think he is now in Washington, representing various interests. He has been identified with the horseless wagon, or something of that nature; and I think he is doing something in connection with the Post Office Department, but I would not be positive about that.

Q. Did he receive any pay except the issuance of stock to him?—A. A thousand dollars in cash was allowed for his traveling expenses, and he was made a director in the company and attended all the meetings.

Q. Did he hold stock before?—A. No.

Q. The stock was given to him?—A. The stock was given to him for these services.

Q. Has the stock a market value?—A. The stock has never been listed.

Q. Has it an ascertainable market value?—A. The only sale of that stock that I can recall was in the summer; I think the stock was sold at 95 asked and 90 bid; but that was the only transaction that I can recall.

Q. When you gave that $10,000 stock to Mr. Neilson, how did you avoid the provision in reference to issuing stock only in return for cash payment?—A. That stock was full-paid stock.

Q. You mean that Mr. Neilson had a bill against the company for $10,000?—A. No; I do not. I mean this, that that stock was stock that was paid to Mr. Neilson that had already been paid for.

Q. Had already been issued—was it transferred from the treasury?—A. No; it was not paid directly. I think it went through Ryan & Co., but I know that it was full-paid stock that he received.

Q. What arrangement did the company make with the stockholder who gave him his individual stock?—A. Well, now, I could not tell just offhand. I know that there was some arrangement made whereby he was to receive full-paid stock.

Q. Now, in reference to Mr. Belden, since his name has already appeared, perhaps it had better appear more definitely; how many bonds has he?—A. I don't know how many bonds Mr. Belden has at the present time, but his firm received 200 bonds of the New York Mail & Newspaper Transportation Co.

Q. What was the consideration of these bonds?—A. He was one of the constructors—James Belden. The constructors were C. J. Ryan & Co. for New York, and for Brooklyn, Belden & Co.

Q. Then they received a corresponding amount of stock?—A. The contract for the building of the bridge line was $200,000 in bonds and $200,000 in stock.

Q. It went to Belden & Co.?—A. Yes, sir; they built the Brooklyn line.

Q. Belden & Co. receiving no cash?—A. No cash.

Q. Was Mr. Belden or his partner interested in the corporation before they took this contract?—A. Mr. Belden was not.

Q. Was his partner?—A. His partner was.

Q. How extensively?—A. His partner was pretty active; I am his partner.

Q. You are his partner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then the firm that made the contract was Belden & Milholland, or Milholland & Belden?—A. Yes, sir; I was in the construction of both companies.

Q. That was a copartnership for this single transaction?—A. That is right.

Q. I understood you a little differently yesterday; that there was no construction company formed out of the stockholders?—A. I said that whoever went in did so by the consent of the stockholders and of the directors. Ours was a construction firm—not a company.

Q. Who was your partner in the other transaction?—A. Cornelius J. Ryan.

Q. Was he interested in the company?—A. No.

Q. Now, were you a practical constructor?—A. I have had some experience. The company wanted somebody that was responsible, some one whom they knew would not take advantage of them. I insisted on the consent of my associates before going into it, and you will find that a matter of record in the office books.

Q. Were there any other contractors besides these two firms—Belden & Milholland and Ryan & Milholland—doing this work in New York or Brooklyn?—A. No.

Q. They did it all?—A. Of course there were subcontractors.

Q. You made subcontracts?—A. We did, for different characters of work that had to be done.

* * * * * * *

Q. It is substantially true, then, that Mr. Belden became interested in this matter after he became a Member of Congress?—A. Well, Mr. Belden has been in Congress for a long time. I think Mr. Belden, if I recollect right, went in with McKinley in the last general election. His active interest would certainly date to his election to Congress, but the general talk that we had had with him extended back for a long time.

Q. He took no active steps in the matter, but became wholly identified with it after. I suppose it would perhaps be well to have it appear here that Mr. Belden is a man of affairs and large wealth?—A. One of the wealthiest men in the State.

Hon. William H. Moody, a member of the joint commission, on April 25, 1900, discussed in the House of Representatives the origin of the pneumatic-tube mail contracts as developed in the hearings quoted above. The following excerpts from his remarks relate to the manner in which the Government was committed in the beginning to a large annual expenditure for pneumatic-tube service:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I crave the attention of the House while I undertake to show how this ill-begotten appropriation began. I think it will be a warning to us to proceed with caution. Let me have your attention for but a few moments upon this proposition.

* * * * * * *

The post-office bill for the fiscal year 1895 contained a very innocent provision for an inquiry into the process of transferring mails by pneumatic tube. There was a small appropriation of $10,000 and a direction that the Postmaster General should report to Congress upon the subject. Whether he did report or not, I do not know. I have not had the opportunity to find out. But the project remained silent until it appeared in the appropriation bill passed June 9, 1896, and I invite your attention to that date. Upon that date Mr. Wilson was Postmaster General of the United States and Charles Neilson was the Second Assistant Postmaster General of the United States. The Second Assistant Postmaster General controls all transportation questions. In that bill was this appropriation:

"The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $35,000 of this amount in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices."

Up to that time there had been no appropriation for the pneumatic-tube service. There was a change of administration. Mr. Neilson left the office of Second Assistant Postmaster General and was succeeded by the able and accomplished gentleman who now holds that office.

I call the attention of the committee to the subsequent history of Mr. Neilson's connection with this enterprise. In the testimony taken by the postal commission there is contained the testimony given by Mr. John E. Milholland on the 2d day of August, 1898. He was examined with respect to the question of whether any public men were in any way interested in the pneumatic-tube service. He said:

"I also wanted to say in regard to one other public man, Mr. Charles Neilson, that after his retirement as Second Assistant Postmaster General he came here and an arrangement was made to have him represent the company at Washington for one year. He was made a director of the company"—

That is, the Pneumatic Co. of New York—

"and was to look after matters at Washington. An arrangement was made for one year, and he was paid for that one year's service a thousand dollars, that being allowed him for traveling expenses, and he was also given $10,000 of the stock of the company.

"Q. How long did this occur after his retirement from office?"

Mr. LITTLE. I hope we may have order. I am very desirous of hearing the statement the gentleman has made, and I wish he would repeat it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It is only from a sense of public duty that I speak of these things. It is unpleasant for me to do it, but I do so because I have been charged by this House as a member of the Postal Commission to investigate the question. If the attention of the House could be secured to its consideration, this appropriation would die the death it ought to. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. I will say to the gentleman that if he will smoke the scoundrels out this side of the House will stay with him.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I was stating that the first appropriation was made when Mr. Neilson was Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under whose administration?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not want to bring any politics into it at all. Within six weeks at the outside after he left the office he was given a thousand dollars in cash and $10,000 in stock for his services at Washington during the succeeding year. What they were I do not know. What they could properly be I could not guess; but he was given this stock, and the testimony in regard to its value was this:

"Q. Has it now an ascertainable market value?—A. The only sale of that stock that I can recall was in the summer; I think the stock was sold at 95 asked and 90 bid."

Mr. BINGHAM. Dollars or cents?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Dollars.

That was the only transaction that I can recall.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Let me finish just here. I ought in justice to put in this question and answer:

"Q. Was any arrangement made with Mr. Neilson at the time he was holding office?—A. None whatever."

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What are you reading from?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I am reading from the testimony taken by the postal commission, given on the 2d day of August, 1896, the testimony of John M. Milholland, representative of the New York Pneumatic Tube Co.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, may I ask if we can get that report?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is entitled to have the whole report, and I think whatever else the postal commission does before this Congress adjourns, it ought to print and put at the disposal of Members all the evidence that it has.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. GAINES. What did this man do in this matter, and who employed him down here?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The Pneumatic Tube Co. employed him.

Mr. SULZER. Is it not a fact that he is one of the editors of the New York Tribune?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not know whether he is or not, and I do not care whether he is or not.

Mr. SULZER. Well, he is.

* * * * * * *

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman, there was other testimony before the commission. I shall mention no names, and I regret extremely to have to speak upon this subject. But we found that the pneumatic-tube system in New York was constructed by contractors who took their pay in stock and bonds; that the only value which that stock and those bonds had was the contract with the Government. It was certainly unfortunate—I think nothing else, believe nothing else, but unfortunate—it was certainly unfortunate that a holder of the bonds and one of the contractors was a Member of this House and a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

A MEMBER. Give us his name.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I decline to state.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the report develop that fact?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman state his name?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I will not. As showing the methods employed by the New York company, I will state that a large block of the stock of this company as a New Year's present was sent to a near relative of an important and influential Member of the House. I am glad to say that the return mail was not allowed to depart from Washington without carrying back that dishonoring and dishonorable gift. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD as a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, a member of the committee, asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department, in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, as follows.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] just before he closed made the statement that the Post Office Department for the last three fiscal years showed a surplus, and he disputed my statement to the contrary. I want to call the attention of the committee and the gentleman from Indiana to page 5 of the report of the Auditor for the Post Office Department for 1916, under the heading "Comparison of postal revenues, expenditures," and so forth. And the last three years are shown in the table. The table commences with 1837, and it gives the last three years, 1914, 1915, and 1916, under the heading of "Audited revenues."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he is discussing this section?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly. This is the section that covers all the appropriations.

Mr. MOON. That is not the point. I suggest to the gentleman that he wait until he gets to a section where his remarks will be appropriate.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think this is appropriate.

Mr. MOON. I do not wish to shut the gentleman off, but I do want to say to him and others that I hope as we proceed with this bill the remarks will be appropriate.

Mr. STEENERSON. This table shows that for the last three years the audited revenues are so much, and then under the headings of "Audited surplus" and "Audited deficits"——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to state that the practice of the House under general debate is that a Member can discuss any subject he sees fit; but under the five-minute rule where the point of order is made remarks must be confined to the amendment. The Chair will ask the gentleman to proceed according to the rule.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will try to confine my remarks to the amendment to strike out the last word. The surplus——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not confining himself to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will suspend. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment. The Chair is constrained to uphold the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Now, the last word may be in different documents. The last words of the gentleman from Indiana relate to the service.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no.

Mr. STEENERSON. The last words in this paragraph are "as follows."

Mr. MOON. Talk about the words "as follows."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have only five minutes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only ask the gentleman from Minnesota to keep in order under the rule, and confine himself to the amendment pending before the House, a point of order having been made.

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I think these words "as follows" are legitimate for discussion. They are not hyphenated. [Laughter.] There is no hyphen there. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], the ranking Republican Member on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, may proceed for five minutes. That need not be a precedent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] be permitted to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that there is no disposition on the part of the committee to shut off the gentleman in discussion, but he is discussing a matter that is proper to be discussed in general debate or under another section of the bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no other section referring to it.

Mr. MOON. I must insist, Mr. Chairman, that in the progress of the bill we must all stand by the rule. But I will not interfere with the gentleman at this time,

Mr. MANN. There is no other place in the bill where it would be appropriate. I appreciate the position of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, under the heading of the document, "Report of the Auditor for the Post Office Department," page 5, "Audited postal surplus" and "Audited postal deficit," we find for the year 1914 a surplus of $4,376,463.05, and for the fiscal year 1916 a surplus of $5,829,236.07, making a total of $10,205,699.12 for the two years. But for 1915 there is a deficit of $11,333,308.97, making a net deficit, according to the figures, of $1,127,609.85.

These figures are official and have never been disputed by anybody, and the only difference between these figures and the Postmaster General's figures is that he did not claim to have deposited the whole amount. He deposited only $3,500,000 one year, and $5,200,000, instead of $5,800,000, in the last year. He deposited what he called the estimated surplus instead of the audited surplus.

The distinction I drew can not be said to have been arrived at by contradicting or calling anybody a liar. I explained that the Post Office Department report was wrong, because they claimed the financial results of the fiscal year 1913 when it did not belong to them. That year belonged to the Taft administration. There was a surplus put into the Treasury on account of that year of $3,800,000 that did not belong to this administration, as I tried to argue, and therefore the results of the financial operations of this administration are reduced by that amount. The three years 1914, 1915, and 1916 are the three first fiscal years of this administration, and we are now in the fourth year.

I also pointed out that, according to their own official communications, they have never paid the railroads the amount that I stated—$1,400,000—which is covered by a specific appropriation made by this Congress, and which is now in process of adjustment, nor have they paid the rural carriers the increased salary for 1915. That has been withheld, and Congress directed them to pay it last session, and it is estimated to amount to $3,000,000. Therefore, instead of a surplus, there is an actual deficit, according to their own figures, and nobody can successfully dispute it. The deficit will at least be five million when these bills are paid. The newspapers last year carried statements of a postal surplus, but in nearly all cases the $11,000,000 deficit was not mentioned. Everyone who has been reading the reports has been led to believe that there was a surplus and the deficit has been ignored.

The fact that they have put into the Treasury $3,800,000, $3,500,000, and $4,200,000 during the last four fiscal years, amounting to $12,500,000, has been heralded everywhere, when the official figures from the Treasury, which I showed to the House, and which I hold in my hand, and which I was ready to submit to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], show that they have withdrawn the amount I have stated. I used no epithets. I called no names. I drew different inferences and conclusions. I disputed the results arrived at, and I repeat that if you examine the evidence that I have put into the RECORD, and which I have here in my possession, and to which I have already called attention, you will find that there has been no postal surplus, even if you ignore the bills that remained unpaid during the last three years, which are the only fiscal years which this administration can claim credit for. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It does not become the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] to say that I indulged in partisan speech when I was only refuting the unfair and partisan inferences and unfounded conclusions drawn by the Postmaster General in the part of the report that I read. That part was as follows:

> Although the average increase in expenditures in the last three fiscal years was $16,673,525.44, due to enlarged postal facilities afforded the public, the rapid growth of the domestic parcel post, and salary increases required by legislation, the service was successfully carried on and its cost defrayed from the current postal revenues.
> As stated in the last annual report, surpluses of $3,800,000 for the year 1913 and $3,500,000 for the year 1914 were paid into the general fund of the Treasury. The fiscal year 1915, due to adverse conditions over which the department had no control, showed a deficit of $11,333,308.97; but the audited revenues for the year just closed show a surplus of $5,829,236.07. Although the audited revenues do not completely represent the financial results of the year, for the reason that many obligations of the Postal Service, representing railroad transportation, payments of contractors for the carrying of mail, and purchases made near the close of the year must be paid after the close of the year, the actual surplus, as nearly as can be determined by careful consideration of the outstanding obligations, is $5,216,243.61, of which amount the sum of $5,200,000 has already been turned into the Treasury. The total of payments to the Treasury during the past four years is therefore $12,500,000.

That the Postal Service is now self-sustaining is evidenced by the fact that for three out of the four years of the present administration audited surpluses aggregating $14,716,350.03 have been shown. Deducting the audited deficiency in 1915 of $11,333,308.97, the net surplus for the four-year period is $3,383,041.06, and but for the business depression occasioned by the European war the department would have undoubtedly secured a surplus of not less than $18,000,000. This is in marked contrast with the deficits for the eight years of the two preceding administrations, which drained the Treasury of $48,739,639.34 and $24,927,657.40, respectively.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Very truly yours,

WM. P. MALBURN,
Assistant Secretary.

Here is the letter from the Treasury, and you will observe that the report of the Postmaster General, while emphasizing the payment into the Treasury during the last four fiscal years of $125,000, carefully omits to mention that he drew out $12,136,592 during the same period. It is a grossly unfair statement and leads one to believe that the twelve and a half millions was clear gain or surplus, while more than twelve million—nearly all of it—was drawn out on alleged deficits. I here insert page 5 of the auditor's report, showing comparison of postal revenues and expenditures, and so forth, from 1837 to 1916.

[1] Amount of balances due late postmasters closed to "Suspense" in excess of losses.

Note that the largest deficit that ever occurred was in the administration of James Buchanan, in 1858, when it was more than 55 per cent of the total expenditures. During Cleveland's first term the deficit rose to 15 per cent. The highest in Roosevelt's administration was a little over 7 per cent. From this table it also appears that the first surplus in nearly 30 years was under Taft, in 1911.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of post-office inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions, at $3,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $2,400 each; 20 inspectors, at $2,250 each; 32 inspectors, at $2,100 each (an increase of 2 submitted in lieu of 2 assistant superintendents, Railway Mail Service, at $2,350 each; to be transferred from the office of the Second Assistant); 20 inspectors, at $2,000 each; 30 inspectors, at $1,900 each; 90 inspectors, at $1,800 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,700 each; 60 inspectors, at $1,600 each; and 65 inspectors, at $1,500 each; in all, $783,700.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to the words in parentheses, in lines 8 to 11, on page 2, which are clearly explanatory. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he desires to have that language remain in the bill.

Mr. MANN. The language is not only explanatory, but it is erroneous.

Mr. MOON. It says—

To be transferred from the office of the Second Assistant.

Mr. MANN. But there is no transfer. There is no increase in the number of inspectors.

Mr. MOON. No; it is exactly the same amount and the same number.

Mr. MANN. And the two superintendents are carried in another place in the bill, in the proper place.

Mr. MOON. That is correct. Let those words be stricken out.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should move that those words be stricken out.

Mr. MOON. I move to strike out the words in parentheses, in lines 8 to 11, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "each," strike out the language "(an increase of 2 submitted in lieu of 2 assistant superintendents, Railway Mail Service, at $2,350 each; to be transferred from the office of Second Assistant)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant superintendents of mails, cashiers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, and superintendents of stations, 30, at not exceeding $2,500 each.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if in these higher supervisory positions there are any increases in the number which would be in fact increases in salary over last year?

Mr. MOON. No; I think not.

Mr. MANN. There is an actual decrease in the number.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are increases in the other grades. For instance, in the $2,200 grade the number is increased from 50 to 55, an increase of 5; in the $2,000 grade, from 130 to 175, an increase of 45; in the $1,800 grade, from 140 to 165, an increase of 25. If the gentleman wants the other figures I can give them to him.

Mr. MOON. The total increases in compensation that the gentleman from Wisconsin speaks of amount to $1,000,000. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] will look at the hearings on pages 11–21, he will find a statement of the facts.

Mr. BENNET. That is set out in the hearings, is it, on pages 11–21?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendents of finance, bookkeepers, superintendents of mails, superintendents of stations, foremen, special clerks, and stenographers, 1,575, at not exceeding $1,400 each.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 23 and 24, on page 8, and lines 1 and 2, on page 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOON: Beginning in line 23, with the word "superintendents," strike out lines 23 and 24, on page 8, and lines 1 and 2 on page 9.

Mr. MOON. That item is included in the next section, and is superfluous here.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, assistant superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of money order, assistant superintendents of registry, assistant superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, cashiers, chief mailing clerks, chief stamp clerks, special clerks, examiners of stations, finance clerks, foremen of crews, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, superintendents of money order, superintendents of registry, superintendents of second-class matter, and superintendents of stations, 1,710, at not exceeding $1,400 each.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. As I understand it, when promotions of clerks are to be made above the grade of $1,200—for instance, from $1,300 to $1,400—they are carried in the paragraph that is now under consideration. Is that correct?

Mr. MOON. I think so.

Mr. MADDEN. These are supervisory grades.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman ask his question again?

Mr. BENNET. All the increases that there are from $1,300 to $1,400 are found in this paragraph that is now under consideration, are they not?

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. BENNET. I will apologize for asking this question, because if I had read the hearings I would not have to ask it, probably. How many clerks in the entire Postal Service are authorized to be promoted this year from $1,300 to $1,400?

Mr. MOON. I do not know just the number.

Mr. BENNET. Is that to be found on the same page?

Mr. MOON. On the same page of the hearings the gentleman will find that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant superintendents of stations, clerks, clerks in in charge of stations, stenographers, superintendents of carriers, and superintendents of second-class matter, 3,300, at not exceeding $1,000 each.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to page 10, line 3, where the word "in" is repeated.

Mr. MOON. I move to strike out the word "in" in line 13.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And to provide for the promotion of all the clerks in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 25 per cent of the clerks in the sixth grade to the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,300 grade, and for the promotion of 25 per cent of the designated "special clerks" in the $1,300 grade to the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,400 grade, and to provide for the promotion of all the clerks in second-class post offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, and for the promotion of 25 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade: And provided further, That there may also be employed at first-class post offices foremen and stenographers at a salary of $1,300 or more per annum; in all, $49,740,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph beginning line 23, page 10, and ending with the word "grade," line 8, page 11.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman state the reasons for his point of order.

Mr. COX. It changes existing law.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order after the gentleman from Indiana gets through his discussion of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to have the gentleman state the grounds for his point of order.

Mr. COX. I have stated it, that it changes existing law. I call attention to the current law, page 5, which provides for the promotion of 75 per cent of clerks in the first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the clerks in the sixth grade to the designation of "Special clerk" in the $1,300 grade, and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the designated "special clerks" in the $1,300 grade to the designation of "special clerk" in the $1,400 grade, and to provide for the promotion of 75 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade, and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade.

Now, I do not remember just how long it has been since the classification law was passed.

Mr. MADDEN. It was passed in 1907.

Mr. COX. The classification law was passed in 1907, and it has been the law ever since, and the permanent law as well as the current law provides for the promotion only of 75 per cent of the clerks. This amendment proposes to provide for a promotion of all the clerks in the first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade and the promotion of 25 per cent of the clerks from the sixth grade to the designation of "special clerks." The current law only provides for the promotion of 5 per cent of clerks from the $1,300 grade to the $1,400 grade. This provides for the promotion of 25 per cent and provides for the promotion of all clerks in the second-class post offices from the fourth to the fifth grade. That is a change of existing law, a change of the classification law passed eight or nine years ago, and is a change of the current law that is now in force.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I contend, seriously contend, although I may be mistaken, that the provision in the pending bill is clearly subject to a point of order because it violates the classification law which has been the law for the last eight or nine years. It changes the current law in this: That the current law only permits 5 per cent of the clerks to be promoted from the $1,300 grade to the $1,400 grade, and this undertakes to promote 25 per cent from the $1,300 grade to the $1,400 grade. If that is not a change of existing law, a change of basic law, a change of the current law, I must confess that I do not know what a change of law is.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken in his position that this item is subject to a point of order. The salary classification act of March 2, 1907, divided post-office clerks and letter carriers into six salary grades. This act provides for successive annual promotions of $100 until the $1,100 grade is reached in offices of the first class, and until the $1,000 grade is reached in offices of the second class. The act left to the discretion of Congress the number of promotions to be authorized each year to the sixth grade, and Congress has been exercising that discretion ever since the act was passed. The first year it began by promoting 50 per cent of the men from the fifth to the sixth grade, and later on it began to appropriate for 75 per cent of the men from the fifth to the sixth grade. This amendment provides for the promotion of all the men from the fifth to the sixth grade. That is the only difference. Now, if the contention made by the gentleman from Indiana is good it would apply not only to this section of the bill but to every section of the bill that has been read, because every section of the bill so far read appropriates for a greater number of men than the current law does. And that must be the case, because of the exigencies of the situation in the development of the business of the post office. It would not be just to say that the Postmaster General should not have the right or that Congress ought not to authorize him to promote men from grade to grade or to increase the number of men in any single grade to meet the needs of the growing business of the post office. In 1912 the Congress commenced to appropriate, as I say, for the promotion of 75 per cent of these employees in the two grades that are referred to. The pending amendment proposes to make it possible to promote them all, all of the clerks and carriers in the first-class offices, to the $1,200 grade instead of 75 per cent of them.

The Chair will bear in mind that the grade is authorized by the fundamental law known as the classification act, passed in 1907, and that all of the clerks and carriers in the second-class offices, instead of 75 per cent of them, are proposed by this amendment to be promoted to $1,100, just as promotions are now made in all the other grades, which are authorized by the law of 1907. It is also proposed by this section of the bill, to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has made the point of order, to promote 25 per cent of the clerks and carriers in the second-class offices from $1,100 to $1,200 per annum, although the classification act—and I want to call the special attention of the Chair to this, for I am sure the gentleman from Indiana does not recall that or he would not have made the statement he did—provides specifically for a $1,200-salary grade in the second-class offices. But it was not until the last session of Congress that provision was made for any promotions to that grade. During the last session of Congress on the recommendation of this committee the current law provided for the promotion of 5 per cent of these clerks and carriers in the second-class offices to the $1,200 grade, and the $1,200 grade in these offices was created by the classification act of 1907.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is ample authority of law for the proposal contained in this section of the bill to which the gentleman has made the point of order. It is also proposed in this section of the bill to promote 25 per cent of the clerks in the $1,200 grade to be special clerks at $1,300, and 25 per cent of the special clerks to the $1,400 grade, classed as special clerks.

Congress at the last session provided for the promotion of only 5 per cent of the men in these two grades. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the designation "special clerk" was created by the act of Congress in 1907 and is the fundamental law upon which this provision of the bill is based; and the salaries of the special clerks which were created in 1907 in the classification act were fixed then at $1,300 and $1,400 per annum. So that the provision for promotion of 25 per cent of the men from $1,200 to $1,300 is not a change of law, but is simply carrying the law into effect as passed by the Congress of 1907, and the promotion of 25 per cent of the men from the $1,300 to the $1,400 grade as special clerks is not a change of law, but is simply a case of long-deferred justice under the law to promote the men into the grades that were created by the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does the classification act of 1907 place any limitation upon or deal with the number of clerks that may be promoted in any one year?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it does not limit the number. It simply provides that there shall be a special-clerk class, and fixes the compensation, but the Congress in its wisdom has not on some occasions provided for any promotions into these grades. On other occasions it has provided for the promotion of 5 per cent and 50 per cent and 75 per cent of the men, and now the committee comes to the House with a recommendation for the promotion of 25 per cent of the men into the grades that were created then by law without any limit upon the right of Congress as to the number of men that shall go into either of these grades and for the promotion of all the men into the grade for which provision has heretofore been made for but 75 per cent of the men. I submit that the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana is not well taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is in doubt as to the paragraph being in order I would like to supplement the observations made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. What I say will be entirely supplementary to the views advanced by the gentleman from Illinois. The classification act of March 2, 1907, provided for six grades for clerks and carriers in the first and second class offices. It provided compulsory promotion in the case of clerks and carriers connected with first-class offices to the fifth grade. It provided compulsory promotion of clerks and carriers connected with second-class offices to the fourth grade, but it made no reference whatsoever as to the number of promotions that should be made into the additional sixth grade in first-class offices or to the additional grades of fifth and sixth from second-class offices, the intendment being to leave to Congress the determination of the number that should be promoted to those respective grades. The grades are clearly established, as the Chair will notice by looking at page 1206 of the Thirty-fourth Statutes at Large, which contains that act. It says:

After June 30, 1907, clerks in the office of first and second classes and carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be divided into six grades, as follows—

And then goes on with the provision providing for compulsory promotion, making no provision whatever for compulsory promotion to those grades to which I have just referred.

Now, as to the consideration of the question of special clerks. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] had made his point of order to the paragraph found on page 9, which carries the classification of special clerks, I would have to argue that the point of order would be well taken, because all those designations virtually are subject to the point of order; but the Chair will notice that on page 9 in the classification of the $1,400 grade, the classification on the same page of the $1,300 grade, the grade of special clerk is provided. If the Chair wishes to have me designate the special line, I will say that in the $1,300 classification it is in line 19 and in the $1,400 grade in line 7. It was subject to the point of order there, as well as to various others of these various designated offices; but the point of order was not taken, and therefore authority has been granted, so far as this bill is concerned, as the grade of special clerk is unknown to any classification act except as contained in an appropriation bill. As there is authority in the bill under consideration for the grade of special clerk, no point of order having been made to it, Congress can, of course, determine the number of clerks that may be promoted to the $1,300 and $1,400 grades, respectively. I can not see how the Chair can escape ruling that this paragraph is in order, in view of the classification act of 1907 and the fact that special clerks are already included in the paragraphs relating to the salaries of $1,300 and $1,400 grades.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up any further time——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very glad to hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I think it is clearly subject to the point of order under the classification act of 1907. Section 299—I assume that is what the Chair has?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Of the postal laws and regulations of the Sixty-second Congress, third session, it says:

Clerks in offices of the first and second grades shall be divided into six grades, as follows: First grade, salary $600; second grade, salary $800; third grade, salary $900; fourth grade, salary $1,000; fifth grade, salary $1,100; sixth grade, salary $1,200.

Now, down to that point the classification act sets out these different grades. I will return to that later on.

Clerks at first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade.

It says they shall be promoted "successively to the fifth grade." Now, what does that mean? Mr. Chairman, that means and can only mean one thing—that it is to be an automatic promotion by some other agency than Congress. What is that other power beyond the power of Congress to promote except the Post Office Department? Now, by this proposed amendment we are taking that authority entirely away from the Post Office Department, or the Postmaster General, and we are undertaking to assume that authority ourselves by automatically promoting all these clerks. It goes on to say:

Clerks at first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade and clerks at second-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fourth grade.

Now, that is the organic law. That is the law which Congress passed. Congress at the time it passed this law did not do this promoting itself. It delegated its authority to the Post Office Department.

And it said to the Post Office Department that it was its duty to promote from the fourth to the fifth grade, and so forth. Now, here by this amendment we are wiping away all that authority which Congress heretofore has given to the Post Office Department, and by one step forward we ourselves are destroying that law and assuming the power of promoting, which heretofore, under the classification act, was lodged exclusively in the province of the Post Office Department. I contend, Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair confesses that he has some doubts about the point of order, but as the Chair sees it, the classification act simply classified certain postal employees, and the law did not require any number to be promoted in one year. The last appropriation bill provided that 75 per cent of these particular carriers and clerks might be promoted.

Mr. COX. That in my opinion was clearly subject to a point of order, if it had been made at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was simply calling attention to that in answer to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] in which he stated that the current law provided for the promotion of 75 per cent of these clerks. The Chair was going to say that that was not permanent law; but it was simply to obtain during that current law. The Chair is of the opinion that as this section authorizes the promotion of clerks within those classes that the point of order is not good.

Now, the Chair is not free from doubt as to this ruling, but feels in deciding against the point of order he is simply putting it in the power of the committee itself to determine whether or not the legislation is advisable. If the Committee of the Whole does not care to pass this legislation, it is for them to determine. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. COX. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 23, 24, 25, on page 10, and all on page 11, down to and including the word "grade," in line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COX: Page 10, strike out all of lines 23, 24, and 25, and all of lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and down to and including the word "grade," in line 8, page 11.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

FRIDAY, January 12, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee for the great gift of life, for the fuller and more abundant life Thou hast revealed to us in Thy Word. Thou hast given to us in our power of self-expression something of the Divine. We pray that our hearts may be so attuned to the Divine Nature as that their outward expressions may be Godlike. Give to us Thy grace that our lives may be conformed to Thy will, and that the acts of our lives may stand the test that Thou hast given to us, a test which brings in its train the blessings of civilization and all the higher blessings and comforts and happiness of life. Hear us in our prayer for the forgiveness of sins and for the Divine guidance. For Christ's sake. Amen.

> Whereas the railways will be an important factor in the commercial development of the country and will either aid or hold back the manufacturers of the country who are planning to meet foreign competition in New World markets: Therefore be it

Washington, D. C.:

We protest reported action Senate Democratic caucus in agreeing to defeat all increases pay for Government employees, including some passed by House. Leading corporations making substantial increases. Government employees' pay stationary many years. Constantly increasing cost of living makes increase pay necessary. We ask your support.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES' UNION,
D. C. IMRIE, President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Arthur Perrine, president of the Federal Employees' Union, of Spokane, Wash., favoring increases in the salaries of all Federal employees. I ask that the telegram may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., January 11, 1917.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.:

Informed Democratic caucus has agreed to defeat increases of pay for Government employees. Urgently request that you use every means to secure increase commensurate with increased cost of living. Condition of custodian employees in this city is pitiable; salary, $55 per month.

ARTHUR PERRINE,
President Federal Employees' Union.

WHITE-PINE BLISTER RUST.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some days ago I presented a proposed amendment, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, proposing to increase the appropriation for the examination and suppression of white-pine blister rust. The American Forestry Association estimates that there is a great danger of the loss of $260,000,000 in the near future unless prompt and efficient steps are taken to arrest that disease. It will be remembered that the chestnut-tree blight was neglected and the chestnut trees of the country are practically destroyed at the present time.

I now rise, Mr. President, to present a paper from the American Forestry Association concerning this matter, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the paper was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January —, —.

With the New England States as the bull's-eye of their attack, 300 delegates to the international forestry conference will meet here next Thursday and Friday (18 and 19) to consider ways and means of checking the spread of the white-pine blister disease which has gained such a strong foothold in the Northeastern States.

Every State in the group will have delegates, appointed by the governors, at the conferences. The committee for the suppression of the white-pine blister disease, of Boston, will have a delegation here headed by Harris S. Reynolds. To-day Gov. Milliken, of Maine, sent in his nominations as follows: L. A. Pierce, Houlton; James W. Sewall, Oldtown; Charles F. Eaton, Princeton; S. S. Scammon, Franklin; S. W. Philbrick, Skowhegan; Blaine S. Viles, Augusta; Elwyn K. Jordan, Alfred; Y. A. Thurston, Andover; Leslie Boynton, Jefferson; Everett E. Amey, Portland.

Lumber associations, too, are sending delegations, and there will be joint sessions of several forestry associations cooperating with the American Forestry Association. Canada will have a representation of 20 delegates.

Charles Lathrop Pack, president of the Forestry Association, announces a program which contains the names of many of the most widely known experts on this continent. P. S. Ridsdale, the secretary, has provided for a showing of 40 paintings of national forests to be shown the delegates at the New National Museum.

The western governors have all appointed delegates, for there is a particular effort on foot to keep the disease out of the sugar pines on the Pacific coast. The first of the delegates will begin arriving next Wednesday.

The two big questions to come before the conference will be State quarantine against the States now infected with the white-pine scourge and also nation-wide quarantine against the shipment of all seedlings and plants that bring these pests from other countries.

"The chestnut blight," said President Pack to-day, "we all know, and we also know what the boll weevil did. It is the failure to act in time that costs the country millions of dollars. The white-pine blister disease is a fungus that grows upon the leaves of the currant and gooseberry bushes. It goes from pine to bushes and back to the pine. It gets under the bark and bursts it. Thus far there has been nothing found that will save a tree thus attacked.

"The thing to do is to inaugurate a nation-wide campaign to arouse the people to do everything possible to check the spread and hold the disease where it is now the worst—New England. The Department of Agriculture has issued a warning which says there must be action at once, for if the disease gets from the home and farm area into the dense timber country there will be no stopping it. This is not belief or rumor; it is the words of the experts of the department as set forth in Bulletin 742, which anyone can have for the asking.

"I know men who have sacrificed valuable decorative trees on their estates and ordered all currant and gooseberry bushes cut down in an attempt to check the spread of this pest. It is only by the concerted action of the Federal Government and the States interlocked with an aroused public opinion that will save these trees for the country and posterity."

The conference will be called to order on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, and after a short business session the main object of the conference will be taken up.

YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the Reno Commercial Club with regard to the proposed extension of the Yosemite National Park, and also a short letter I have written in answer to it. I will not ask that they be read, but I ask unanimous consent that they be published in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the request was. There was so much confusion in the Chamber I could not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have here a resolution from the Reno Commercial Club protesting against the enlargement of the Yosemite National Park. It is rather a long resolution, and I have asked unanimous consent to have it published without reading, together with the acknowledgment by me of its receipt.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asks to have them printed in the RECORD?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RENO COMMERCIAL CLUB,
Reno, Nev., December 23, 1916.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PITTMAN:

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Reno Commercial Club that certain persons are endeavoring to stir up public sentiment against further development of hydroelectric power upon Rush and Levining Creeks, in the county of Mona, State of California; and

Whereas it is definitely stated by said certain persons that such development should not be permitted on account of the alleged destruction of the "beautiful scenery" connected with the waterfalls on said creeks; and

Whereas it has come to the attention of this commercial club that said certain persons are making an invidious effort to have the eastern boundary line of the Yosemite National Park extend to include the falls and hydroelectric development plant in question, thereby depriving the present power companies of their water supply; and

Whereas it appears that the hydroelectric development has been made by Pacific Power Corporation by virtue and under authority invested by certain permits granted by departments of the Federal Government having jurisdiction thereof, in due and regular form, as in such cases by law made and provided; and

Whereas it has been conclusively shown that the electrical energy now generated at the plants of said corporation are being used for the development of agriculture, operation of mines, industries, lighting of streets, homes, and other useful purposes of the many communities and towns in Nevada, including Fairview, Wonder, Tonopah, Goldfield, and Hawthorne; and

Whereas it appears that the service to be thus supplied by the Pacific Power Corporation and its associated and interconnected companies is absolutely essential to the complete development of important and growing districts of Nevada; and

Whereas it is the sense of the Reno Commercial Club, after a full investigation of all the facts in the matter, that it is unalterably opposed to any interference with the lawful undertakings of said corporation, and that it should be the policy of our State and Federal Government to foster and encourage in every proper manner the development of the latent resources of Nevada, to the end that its citizens may receive the full benefit and enjoyment of the conveniences thereby afforded and the taxable wealth of our State increased by the large investment required to bring such developments to fruition: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Reno Commercial Club is opposed to any action being taken by the Federal authorities or others that would have the effect of hampering or preventing the lawful undertakings of said Pacific Power Corporation in the development of useful hydroelectric power, and respectfully requests the Secretary of the Interior and the California State Water Commission to take no action looking toward the revocation of the permits under which the said developments are made; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to spread this resolution upon the minutes of the Reno Commercial Club and mail a copy thereof to Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.; secretary of the California State Water Commission, San Francisco, Cal.; Hon. KEY PITTMAN, United States Senator; Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, United States Senator; Hon. E. E. ROBERTS, United States Congressman; and a copy to the office of the Pacific Power Corporation at Goldfield, Nev.

Yours, very truly,

RENO COMMERCIAL CLUB,
By G. A. RAYMER, Secretary.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
January 8, 1917.

Mr. G. A. RAYMER,
Secretary Reno Commercial Club, Reno, Nev.

MY DEAR MR. RAYMER: The receipt of the resolution of your club under date of December 23, relative to an effort being made to extend the boundaries of Yosemite National Park so as to include certain hydroelectric-power development that will supply power in the State of Nevada, has already been acknowledged. I now take this occasion to communicate personally with your club with regard to my position in the matter.

I am heartily in favor of establishing national parks for the preservation of objects of peculiar beauty and national interest. I believe that under national-park control these parks can better be made to serve the use of the entire public. However, in no case should these parks be established when their creation would retard the physical development of the natural resources of the sections in their vicinity. In other words, our natural desire to preserve the beautiful and interesting and to provide parks for the recreation of all of our people must give way to the higher use of providing the necessities of life at reduced cost.

Our State, unfortunately, is not possessed of oil, coal, gas, or extensive forests of timber and we must depend upon hydroelectric power to a very large extent for our motive power. The highest development of our State depends upon the extensive development of such power. I therefor will not consent to the passage of any legislation for any purpose whatever that will reduce or restrict the opportunities for such development.

I have already taken this matter up in person with Mr. Mather, assistant to the Secretary of the Interior, and I will immediately present the subject to the Secretary of the Interior.

You would aid me materially in this matter if your body would provide for a thorough investigation of this subject and furnish me with the necessary data.

Very sincerely, yours, KEY PITTMAN.

IMPORTATION OF SISAL AND MANILA HEMP.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Farm Implement News of December 28, a paper very largely circulated among the agricultural people of the country, contains the following:

Has the American farmer no friends in Congress? Is there not one Senator with sufficient courage to defy tradition if necessary and demand that the committee which investigated the Sisal Trust submit a report forthwith?

Is there no Member of Congress who dares to demand that the authorities take such steps as they may to rescue the farmer from the clutches of this predatory combination?

Is there not one Senator or one Representative who is big and brave enough to demand that the Government put an end to extortion in the sale of binder-twine material?

I have read this quotation from the Farm Implement News because it challenges the courage of Senators and Representatives, and I desire to meet this challenge in the name of my colleagues and to demand to know what has become of this investigation. If I can get an answer from some member of the committee I shall be very glad.

Mr. RANSDELL. As the chairman of the subcommittee authorized to investigate the sisal-hemp situation, I shall be very glad to answer any question the Senator may desire to propound, but I did not hear distinctly the question which he has just put.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Farm Implement News, a very worthy agricultural publication, makes the charge that no Senator has sufficient courage to ascertain the present status of the investigation; and I rose, on behalf of a number of my colleagues who are interested equally with myself in seeing that the subject does receive thorough and fair treatment, to demand to know the present condition of that investigation—whether it has been concluded.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the investigation was concluded some time ago; but for reasons which the committee thought entirely good and satisfactory the report was not submitted to the Senate until yesterday. It is now in the hands of the printing clerk to be printed. I presume it will be in the hands of every Senator this afternoon, or certainly not later than to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the committee reached a unanimous conclusion about it?

Mr. RANSDELL. It has.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the Senator any objection to saying about what they have concluded?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will read our final recommendations, which will give our conclusions perhaps better than if I should attempt to put them into my own words. The following are the recommendations of the subcommittee:

1. It urges the Department of Justice to examine carefully the record in this investigation and to take such action as the law and the facts may warrant. The committee hopes that some means of checking the power of this monopoly may be found.

"This monopoly" refers to the Comision Reguladora, which we found to be a monopoly that was very oppressive to the American people, costing them at the present time something like $26,000,000 per annum.

To aid in this, it directs that a copy of all hearings held before it, all briefs filed by the various parties, and this report be sent to the Attorney General.

2. The committee feels that the facts set forth herein demonstrate that the American people are being forced to pay for one of the necessities of life many millions more than the fair value thereof, and it therefore refers this report to the State Department, with the suggestion that the matter be taken up through diplomatic channels to see if some measure of relief can no be obtained.

Our reason for making this recommendation is that the monopoly seems to have been created in the State of Yucatan, one of the States of Mexico. It was conceived and carried out there under a law passed by the legislature of that country. It has agents in this country, who are located in the city of New York, who sell the sisal. It therefore seemed to us that this was a matter in which the diplomatic agencies of our Government could probably be successfully invoked; at least, we hope so, because we are not certain that the Comision Reguladora can be reached by our antitrust laws. The acts of the agents of the comision in this country may, however, come within the purview of our laws; and hence we referred the matter to the Department of Justice.

3. The committee urges the farmers of the country to make every effort to find a suitable substitute for sisal which can be grown within the United States at reasonable cost, in order that they may no longer be in the power of a foreign monopoly for so essential a product as binder twine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall yield to the Senator from New Hampshire in just one moment, when I finish reading the recommendations of the committee:

This report is referred to the Department of Agriculture with the recommendation that it make special investigations toward this end.

Now I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I observe that this Yucatan monopoly has agents in this country representing it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the investigation develop the fact as to whether there is much American capital invested in the enterprise in Yucatan, or is it wholly a Mexican affair?

Mr. RANSDELL. From all the evidence before us, as I recall it—I will ask my colleagues on the committee to correct me if I make a mistake—the business is conducted by the Yucatan planters. The plantations are owned by Yucatecans and the labor is performed by the peons. So far as I recall there is no American capital invested in the business in Yucatan.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I reach the correct conclusion from the discussion that has already taken place, the price of this necessary article has about doubled since this investigation began. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; the price has practically doubled since we closed our investigation. The price was quoted on the market at 7⅞ cents at that time and it is now 14½ cents; the price has increased practically 100 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I presume that the report will become the subject of further consideration. Does the Senator propose to offer any bill or resolution upon the subject?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that my two associates on the committee and myself have not fully considered that question. We thought we were certainly doing the very best we could for the benefit of the American people and that the practical recommendations we made could best be taken up by the three departments named without the aid of any legislation. If the Department of Justice finds that there is no law under which relief can be afforded and can recommend to us the passage of additional laws which well permit it to reach this monopoly, that, of course, would be considered. We should be very glad to have the advice of the department in that respect; but your subcommittee did not care to recommend at this time any special legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think that the statement of the Senator from Louisiana answers the question which was propounded to me by an honored constituent. While the outcome of the investigation may not have justified all their hopes, still if it has been thorough and painstaking and recommendations have been made in accordance with the power of our Government and its duty, I do not see what further can be done. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Louisiana for his answer to this interrogatory.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in further answer to the Senator, especially with regard to the thoroughness and fairness of the investigation, I would like to say that the committee spent nearly three months making the investigation. The testimony taken covers two large volumes of considerably over 2,000 pages. We heard everybody on both sides of the case who desired to be heard; we notified all the people interested in the growth of sisal to come and testify before us if they so desired; we notified the men in this country who are handling the raw product and selling it to the manufacturers; and all the manufacturers of sisal, not only those who produce binder twine, which was the product in which we were especially interested, but also the manufacturers of rope, some sisal being used for this purpose; in fact, I may say, we opened the doors just as widely as possible and went into the subject as thoroughly as we knew how.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he found it possible to ascertain the question of the wage scale of the people employed in the industry in Yucatan?

Mr. RANSDELL. A great deal of testimony was taken in regard to that. It was difficult to find the exact wage scale, but we did take very considerable testimony to ascertain the cost of sisal in Yucatan; and that is very fully set out in our report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As a matter of fact, is not the labor largely semipeon labor—low-priced labor?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is; but the price of labor has gone up somewhat in recent years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The price of labor has gone up even there?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir; it has gone up, but is still comparatively low priced. We had very full testimony in regard to the cost of sisal, and our report goes rather fully into that testimony, so that the Senator will not have to read the evidence, but he can get from our report what we think was the fair cost of making sisal.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator if the increase in the price of nearly 100 per cent refers to the increase in the price of sisal in Yucatan or the increase in the cost of the twine here?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that that increase of 100 per cent applies to the price at which the raw product, the sisal, is now sold to the American consumer as compared to its price when our hearings closed last April. It is very difficult to state the actual cost of producing sisal in Yucatan. The Yucatecans figure out that it was costing in the neighborhood of 6 cents per pound.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is, to produce it?

Mr. RANSDELL. To produce it. Then, of course, the cost of transportation to this country was rather high, owing to the war and the shortage of ships. Many witnesses, however, testified that it did not cost as much as 6 cents per pound to produce sisal. All of that is fully set out in our report. However, it was being sold at the time we closed our hearings at 7⅞ cents, which seemed to allow——

Mr. McCUMBER. In Yucatan?

Mr. RANSDELL. No; in New York—which seemed to allow a very fair profit to the growers of sisal. Now it is quoted in New York at 14½ cents.

Mr. McCUMBER. To what extent has the price of the twine itself increased since the subcommittee began its investigation?

Mr. RANSDELL. We have had no report on that point; at least, I do not recall any report on the increase in the price of the twine itself. I will say to the Senator that the manufacturers of sisal twine, particularly the International Harvester Co., which is the largest manufacturer, the Plymouth Cordage Co., the next largest, and penitentiaries in the big wheat growing States, nearly all of which have binder-twine factories, make their contracts at the beginning of the season and deliver the twine throughout the season at the contract price agreed upon in advance. They make their contracts for twine for the season closed only a short while ago on the prices of last spring and early summer. I do not know just what the price would be now. I will ask my colleague on the committee [Mr. GRONNA] if he can answer that question.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the chairman of the subcommittee that the prices have not yet been made by the manufacturers.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, as I understand, it has been indicated what the prices will be.

Mr. GRONNA. No indication has been given. They have been unable to make the prices because the Reguladora, which controls all the sisal, the raw material, has been increasing the price of sisal from time to time. The statement made by the Senator from Louisiana, that it has increased 100 per cent, has reference only to the raw material, the sisal.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, that would not justify an increase of 100 per cent in the price of twine?

Mr. GRONNA. No; it would not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the Senator tell us about what would be a reasonable advance in the price of twine on the supposition that the increase in the price of the material in Yucatan is about 100 per cent?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. Is the discussion now going on in order as a part of the morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If any Senator should make a point of order to that effect, the Chair would probably have to sustain it.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not want to do that if the matter will not take much longer, but I have some morning business which I desire to present.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator from Colorado will defer his point of order for just a moment, as this is a very interesting question.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not make a point of order, and I assure the Senator I have no intention of making a point of order, but I wanted to discover what was going on and whether it was a part of the regular morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a part of the regular morning business, and arises because of a memorial which I have here and which I have read to the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may be permitted to answer the question of my colleague, I can only say that it would be almost impossible for the committee to arrive at any conclusion as to what the increase should be in twine manufactured from sisal, because the manufacturers hold some of the sisal at 7⅞, some of the sisal at 7⅞, some of it at 10½, some of it at 13½, and now they have to pay 14½ for it in New York.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question in regard to this matter. Did not the evidence show that this corporation was financed largely by bankers in New Orleans and other bankers in the State of Louisiana?

Mr. RANSDELL. It did. That is brought out fully in our report.

Mr. CURTIS. Did not the evidence also show that but for this financial assistance from the United States this business could hardly be carried on?

Mr. RANSDELL. We state very emphatically in our report that this American corporation, known as the Pan-American Co., gave existence, gave absolute life, to the Yucatan Co., and that but for the financial aid given to the Yucatan monopoly by the Pan-American Banking Co. it could not have done business successfully. We show that the Comision Reguladora was created in 1912 and practically had no life until some time in 1915, when it made its negotiations with the Pan-American Co., and thereafter proceeded to do business along good old-fashioned trust lines, and handled the whole business from that time on. That is all brought out in our report.

Mr. CURTIS. What is the recommendation of the committee to the Attorney General?

Mr. RANSDELL. We refer the whole matter to him. We say it is such an intricate and complicated legal question that we do not pretend to determine what are the rights of the matter, but we refer the whole thing to him and ask him to take such action as the law and facts warrant.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if his committee did not find that the American market was practically the only market that the Yucatan producers had for this product?

Mr. RANSDELL. It did.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it produces about a million bales a year?

Mr. RANSDELL. In the neighborhood of a million bales; each bale weighing 375 pounds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And most of that is taken by one American corporation?

Mr. RANSDELL. A good per cent by one corporation. The International Harvester Co. takes a rather large per cent; but there is also a great deal taken by the Plymouth Cordage Co., and also by the factories in penitentiaries.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I only desire to add that I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Louisiana for the information he has given us, and I hope that something will come of the recommendations which the committee have made, either in the Attorney General's Office, through the State Department, or in some other way, so that this matter may be at least given the attention which its importance deserves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 6750) to provide for the appointment of the register of wills of the District of Columbia by the justices of the Supreme Court of said District, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 922) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11288) for the relief of S. S. Yoder, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 920) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the amendment submitted by himself on December 19, 1916, relative to damages and payment for ground owned by Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller on account of condemnation proceedings, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, reported it with an amendment, submitted a report (No. 921) thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 286 to authorize the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate to appoint a superintendent of the folding room, reported it without amendment.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably Senate resolution 310. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 310, submitted by Mr. POMERENE on the 9th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, for a period of two months.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, is that resolution from the Committee on Retrenchment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the resolution is reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and provides an additional clerk for the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. THOMAS. I suppose, then, that they offered it from the civil-service side, and not from the retrenchment side.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Ohio if he desires a continuation of this employment over this session, or is it just for the session?

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for the services of an additional clerk for two months. I am obliged to have this clerical assistance in my office. I want to say to the Senate with perfect frankness that it is not so much due to the work of the committee as it is to the general correspondence, the work that I have with the departments, and the work of the office generally.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection, if the Senator desires it; but I thought perhaps he needed the assistance only during the session.

Mr. POMERENE. It can be limited in that way if the Senator desires. I have been obliged to have an extra clerk all this time at my own expense.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution if the Senator will make it during the session of this Congress.

Mr. POMERENE. It may be so limited if desired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not object to the resolution, but I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the amount of compensation is sufficient upon which an appointee can subsist? We are told now that without a general horizontal increase the welfare of Government employees will suffer.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the clerk will be entirely content with the amount specified.

Mr. THOMAS. The chances are that he will be back asking for an increase.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks for the present consideration of a resolution reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection if the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] has none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I believe I will not object to the resolution. I think that committee stands on a little different basis from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard or the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. As I understand, the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment is now engaged upon a bill to provide a retirement plan for Government employees. If the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard is engaged in any work so important as that, I should not object to it having an additional clerk during the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he has offered an amendment to the resolution? Amendments to the resolution are now in order.

Mr. POMERENE. The resolution, as submitted, provides for the employment of an additional clerk for two months. I have had this extra clerk in the office ever since the first of this session, and the resolution was purposely drawn in this way to provide two months' salary to this clerk. If there is any objection to it, I do not want it passed.

The resolution was agreed to.

STANDARD TIME.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 7828) to provide standard time for the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that this is a duplicate of the bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. BORLAND, of Missouri. I have a brief letter from Mr. A. B. Jenks, president of the New Hampshire Board of Trade, which I will ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

NEW HAMPSHIRE BOARD OF TRADE,
January 10, 1917.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There has been introduced in the House of Representatives bill 19431 by Mr. BORLAND, of Missouri, to provide standard time for the United States.

I am writing you particularly about that part of the bill which reads as follows:

"During the summer months, i. e., during a period starting at 2 o'clock a. m. on the last Sunday in April and ending at 2 a. m. on the first Sunday in September, the standard time for each of the zones would be advanced one hour from the mean astronomical time of the controlling time meridian."

This bill was referred to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

I am especially interested in the passage of this bill or any amendment to it that will not affect the clause referred to.

Last summer, as president of the Manchester Publicity Association and Chamber of Commerce, I inaugurated a movement better known as the movement for setting the clocks ahead one hour and saving one hour of daylight here in New Hampshire. Without exception, every manufacturing concern of any importance in Manchester, of which you know there are some sizeable ones, including the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., W. H. McElwain Co., and our own company, the F. M. Hoyt Shoe Co., were heartily in favor of the movement. I tried to get in touch with other boards of trade and chambers of commerce throughout the State, and did to some extent with a favorable reply.

At that time the New Hampshire Board of Trade took favorable action on the movement, but owing to the lateness in the season and the complications that we felt might arise from putting the same into effect as an independent State, it seemed to be wise to abandon the project until such time as there was some kind of national legislation.

I can assure you that the sentiment in New Hampshire is overwhelmingly favorable to this daylight-saving plan.

Since that time I have been elected president of the New Hampshire Board of Trade, and it is in my official capacity that I ask you to not only vote for this bill but to do everything you can to secure its passage, believing it to be for the best interest of every class and condition of people in our State.

Sincerely, yours,

A. B. JENKS, President.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I trust the committee will take it up and act upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

SUFFRAGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress the power to extend the right of suffrage to residents of the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed for ratification by the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid as a part of said Constitution, namely, insert at the end of section 3, Article IV, the following words:

"The Congress shall have power to admit to the status of citizens of a State the residents of the District constituting the seat of the Government of the United States created by Article I, section 8, for the purpose of representation in the Congress and among the electors of President and Vice President and for the purpose of suing and being sued in the courts of the United States under the provisions of Article III, section 2.

"When the Congress shall exercise this power the residents of such District shall be entitled to elect one or two Senators, as determined by the Congress, Representatives in the House according to their numbers as determined by the decennial enumeration, and presidential electors equal in number to their aggregate representation in the House and Senate.

"The Congress shall provide by law the qualifications of voters and the time and manner of choosing the Senator or Senators, the Representative or Representatives, and the electors herein authorized.

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing power."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, should that joint resolution go to the Committee on the District of Columbia or to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It depends on the desire of the Senator who introduced the resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rather think, Mr. President, that the Judiciary Committee would be the proper committee to consider that joint resolution, although the general subject has been heretofore considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I suggest that it go to the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500,000 for the construction, operation, maintenance, and incidental operations at the Black Canyon extension, Boise project, Idaho, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GRONNA submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL OIL SUPPLY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on last Tuesday morning I called the attention of the Senate to an editorial regarding what is popularly known as the Phelan leasing bill, at which time I made this statement:

Now, let me say, Mr. President, that this entire subject is within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. The Department of the Interior is satisfied, not entirely so but as a compromise is satisfied, with the amendments which the Committee on Public Lands considered and which were recently reported by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

I made that statement, Mr. President, because the amendments which the Senator from California presented were discussed in the presence of a representative of the Interior Department, and, as I understood, they met with his approbation. I am in receipt this morning of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior informing me that I misapprehended to some degree the attitude of the Interior Department, and I ask, therefore, that his letter to me and the memorandum accompanying it be published in the RECORD. I will not detain the Senate by asking to have it read.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to hear it read.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter. During the reading,

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I thought this letter referred to amendments in the water-power bill, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not care for the further reading of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have it read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the reading of the letter.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 19, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning I note a statement by you to the effect that—

"The Department of the Interior is satisfied, not entirely so but as a compromise is satisfied, with the amendments which the Committee on Public Lands considered and which were recently reported by the Senator from California."

This refers to the oil-leasing bill. This statement, or something similar, was made last summer in one of the newspapers, and at that time I sent out the inclosed notice which stated then and states now my position with relation to the so-called Phelan amendment. Perhaps that is not the amendment to which you refer as having been "recently reported," for I know that an effort has been made lately to reach a compromise agreement with the Navy Department through the Public Lands Committees of both Houses. My position as to the oil situation is expressed in my annual report of 1915 on pages 13, 14, and 15.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESS.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
July 7, 1916.

A statement has been brought to my attention that I am in favor of the so-called Phelan amendment to the oil leasing bill. Where the warrant comes for such a statement I do not know. The only time that anything like it was ever presented to me was when Lieut. Gov. Eshleman, of California, brought a similar proposal to me, and I told him that I would not stand for it. The Phelan amendment has never been referred to me by Congress, nor does any person who ever talked with me labor under the delusion that I favor it. I am in favor of passing an oil leasing bill, however, along the lines of the one passed by the House twice in the last two years, known as the Ferris bill. The difference between the Phelan amendment and the provisions of the Ferris bill is one of liberality in treatment of claimants.

My position is a matter of record and can be found by examining my reports upon the measure before Congress and my annual reports. In my last annual report I expressly stated that I would not "assume to say what policy should be followed as to the naval reserve lands." There is no danger of the Navy being short of oil, for there are nearly 3,000,000 acres of public oil lands now withdrawn. Included therein are two special naval reserves which are practically free from adverse claims. These contain approximately 130,000,000 barrels of oil, and more of this area can be withdrawn for the Navy at any time by the President whenever he desires to do so.

I have tried to deal with these propositions without regard to politics, and have had the support of such eminent conservationists as Mr. LENROOT and Mr. KENT, whose view has always been the same as mine, that to keep 3,000,000 acres of oil lands locked up indefinitely, while gasoline is climbing higher, is not good sense and plays right into the hands of monopoly. If Congress can at this time of great pressure deal with the matter of leasing legislation, I have no doubt sane and conservative legislation will result that will help every real developer and consumer interested in oil and gasoline and which will prevent waste and monopoly.

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am rather surprised by the contents of the letter, for I understood the source of the amendment was the same as the Senator from Colorado stated.

As a member of the committee, I wish to say that when the amendment was handed to me I was told that it had been prepared in the office of the Secretary of the Interior by a law
